But considering that he being then Generall, did thereby hazard the fafety of his contrie: I can not tell whether he did not breake a greater faith which he ought to have had, to the safetie of his contriemen. Neither coulde be also alleage for his excuse, that he did not layer handes on Misanes, for feare to bring the city into manifest warre: but that for a colour he did preferre the faith which he had fworne and promifed vnto him, and the inflice that he would obferue in his behalfe: that for E his fake, Nicanor should afterwards keepe him felfe in peace, and doe no hurte to the A was NIANS, Howbeit in troth it seemed, that nothing deceived Phocies: but by the over trust he had in this Nicanor. The which seemeth to be so, bicause when divers came to him to complaine of Nicanor, that he fought all the secret meanes he coulde to surprise the hauen of Pi-122, and that he dayly passed ouer souldiers in the Ile of SALANINA, and practised to bribe certaine of the inhabitants within the precinct of the hauen : he would neuer heare of it, and muche lesse beleue it. Furthermore, when Philomedes LAMPRIAN made a motion, that the A. THEN I ANS should prepare to be in readines to waite apon their Captaine. fion of the Orator Aenonides, and at the request of Archestratus, stablished a decree, to sende Ambassadors vnto Polyperchon, to accuse Phoeion: insomuch as both parties met at one selse time, and found him in the field with the king about a village of the contrie of Phocide, called Phary GEs, standing at the foote of the mountaine Acrorion, which they surname also Galaten. There Polyperehon commaunded a cloth of gold to be fet vp, and caused the king to be set under the same, and all his chiefest frendes about him. But to beginne withall, he made Dinarchus to be taken, and commaunded them to put him to death after they had racked him: C then he willed the ATHENIANS to tell what they had to fay. Then they beganne to quartell. and to be lowde one with an other, accusing one an other in the presence of the king and his counsell: vntill Agnonides at length stepped forth, and fayd: my Lordes of MACEDON, putys all in prison, and then send vs bound handes and seete to ATHENS, to gene accompt of our doinges. The king laughed to heare him fay fo. But the noble men of MACED ON that were present then, and divers straungers besides to heare their complaints:made signe to the Ambassadors to veter their accusations before the king, rather then to referre them to the hearing of the people at ATHENS. Howbeit both parties had not alike indifferent hearing for Polyperchon checked vp Phocion oftentimes, and did still cut of his tale, as he thought to purge him felfe: infomuch as in anger, he bet his staffe he had in his hand against the ground, and com-D maunded him at length to hold his peace, & to get him thence. And when Hegemon also told Polyperchon, that he him felfe could best witnesse, howe Phocion had alwayes faithfully served and loued the people: he angrily aunswered him, come not hether to lye fallely vpon me, in the presence of the king. Therewith the king rose out of his seate, and tooke a speare in his hand, thinking to have killed Hegemon: had not Polyperchon fodainly embraced him behinde; and stayed him. So the counsell rose, and brake up, but presently Phocion was apprehended, and they that stoode by him. Certaine of his frends feeing that, which stoode further of, muf-Photion fine feled their faces, and straight conveyed them selves away. The rest were sent prisoners to A-THEM'S by Clitus, not so muche to have their causes heard there, as to have them executed for condemned men. Furthermore, the manner of the earying of them to ATHENS was shamefull. For they were caried vpon cartes through the great streete Ceramicum, vnto the Theater: where Clittus kept them, vntill the Senate had affembled the people, excepting no bondman, no straunger, nor defamed person out of this assemblie, but less the Theater wide open to all comers in what soener they were, and the pulpit for Orations free for euerie man that would speake against them. So first of all, the kings letters were read openly, by the which he did aduertise the people, that he had found these offendors conuicted of treason: notwithstanding, that he referred the fentence of their condemnation vnto them, for that they were free men. Then Clieus brought his prisoners before the people, where the noble men when they faw Phocion, were ashamed, and hiding their faces, wept to see him. Howbeit, there was one that rose vp, and sayd: my Lordes sith the king referreth the judgement of so great persons E unto the people, it were great reason all the bondmen and straungers which are no free citizens of ATHENS, thould be taken out of this affembly. The people would not agree to it, but

Howe then can ye doe it, & he, that will not heare our iustifications? Yet coulde they not be

For my felfe, my Lordes, I confesse I haue done you wrong, & haue in gouernment committed faults deseruing death: but for these prisoners with me, what have they done, why you shoulde put them to death? The common people aunswered him: bicause they are thy frends. With this aunswere Fhoeun departed, and spake neuer a word more. Then the Orator Agnonides holding a decree in R his hand ready wrytten, red it openly to the people, declaring how they should be judged by voyces, whether the offendors had deserved death or not: and if it were found they had then that they should all be put to death. And there were that when this decree was red, cried out. He family and house of Cato, tooke his first glorie and name of his great The paren-grandfather, Cato the Censor: who for his vertue (as we have declared tage of Cato. in his life)was one of the famousest and worthiest men of Roads in his time. This Cate whom we nowe wryte of, was left an broham by his father and mother, with his brother Cepio, and Porcia his fifter, Sermilia was also Catoes halfe fifter, by his mothers fide. All these were brought by vp with their vncle Limins Drusses, at that time the greatest mass of the corage besides, as any other ROMANE. Men report, that dashfrom his called childhood shewed him selfe both in word and countenaunce, and also in all his pastimes and note. Brecreacions, verie constant, and stable. For he would goe through with that he tooke apon him to doe, and would force him felfe about his strength; and as he could not away with flatterers, fo was he rough with them that went about to threaten him. He would hardly laught and yet had ener a pleasaunt countenance. He was not choller kennor easie to be angest d: but when the blood was up, he was hardly pacified. When he was first put to schoole, he was ver ry dull of ynderstanding, and slow to learne: but when he had once learned it he would never forget it, as all men elfe commonly doe. For fuch as are quicke of conceite, have dominonly VPby quicke the worst memories: and contrarily, they that are hard to learne, dockeepe that better which with have no they have learned. For every kinde of learning is a motion and quickening of the thinde. He were good mefeemed besides not to be light of credit, & that may be some cause of his slownes in conceite. For truely he suffereth somewhat that learneth, and thereof it commeth, that they that have least reason to resist, are those which doe give lightest credit. For young men are caselyer perfwaded then old men, and the ficke then the whole. And where a man hath least reason for his douts: there he is foonest brought to beleue any thing. This notwithstanding it is reported that Cate was obedient vnto his schoolemaister and would doe what he commanued him: howbeit he would aske him still the cause and reason of enery thing. In deede his schoolemaifler was very gentle, and readier to teach him, then to flrike him with his fift. His name was Surpedo, e.e.

Surpedo. Furthermore, when Cato was but a young boy, the people of IT ALTE which were 100sf holeconsederats of the ROMANES, sued to be made free citizens of ROME. At that time it chaunt maising. ced one Pompedius Silo, a valliant fouldier, and of great estimation among the confederats of they did not let that day paffe, but that they did defile fo folemne a feast, with the violet death A of a man. His enemies notwithstanding, continuing still their anger against him, made the people passe a decree, that his bodie should be banished, and caried our of the bondes of the contry of ATTICA, forbidding the ATHENIANS that no fire should be made for the solemnia fing of his funeralls. For this respect no frend of his durst once touch his body. Howebeits poore man called Conopion, that was wont to get his liuing that way, being hyered for money to burne mens bodies: he tooke his corfe, and caried it beyond the city of ELEVSIN, and gen Photions fu- ting fire out of a womans house of MEGARA, he folemnifed his funeralls. Furthermore, there was a gentlewoman of MEGARA, who comming by chaunce that way, with her gentlewomen, where his body was but newly burnt: the caused the earth to be cast vp a little where the body was burnt, and made it like to a hollow tombe, whereupon she did vie such sprincklings a and effusions, as are commonly done at the funeralls of the dead: & then taking up his bones in her lappe in the night, the brought them home, and buried them in her harth, faying : () deare harth, to thee I bequeath the relikes of this noble and good man, and pray thee to keepe them faithfully, to bring them one day to the graue of his auncesters, when the ATHENTANE shall come to confesse the fault & wrong they have done vnto him. And truly it was not long after, that the ATHENIANS found by the vntowardnes of their affaires, that they had put him to death, who only maintained inflice, and honesty at ATHENS. Whereupon they made his image to be fet vp in braffe, and gaue honorable buriall to his bones, at the charges of the citie. And for his accusers, they condemned Agnonides of treason, and put him to death them felues. The other two, Epicurus and Demophilus being fled out of the citie, were afterwardes O met with by his sonne Phocus, who was revenged of them. This Phocus as men reporte, was otherwise no great good man, who fancying a young maide which a bawde kept, comming by chaunce one day into the schoole of Lyczum, he heard Theodorus the Atheist (to wit, that beleued not there were any goddes) make this argument. If it be no shame, sayd he, to deliuena mans frend from bondage, no more shame is it to redeeme his leman which he loueth: etien fo it is all one to redeeme a mans leman, as his frende. This young man taking this argument to serue his turne, beleuinge that he might lawefully doe it, got the young maide he loued from the bawde. Furthermore, this death of Phocion did also reuiue the lamentable death of Socrates vinto the GRECIANS; for, was to see the D the ROMANES, and a great frend besides of Drujus: to be lodged many dayes at his house. He A in this time falling acquainted with thele young boyes, fayd one day vnto them: good boyes, intreate your vicle to speake for vs, that we may be made free citizens of Rome. Capio similing nodded with his head, that he would. But Cato making no aunswere, looked very wisely apon the straungers that lay in the house. Then Pompedius, taking him aside, asked him : and thou my pretie boy, what fayest thou to it? Wilt thou not pray thine vncle, as well as thy brother to be good to his guestes ? Cato still held his peace, and aunswered nothing, but shewed by his filence and looke, that he would not heare their request. Then Pompedius taking him up in his armes, did put him out of the window, as if he would have let him have gone: and speaking more sharply to him then he did before, he cast him many times out of his armes without the window, and favd, promife vs then, or elfe I will let thee fall. But Cato abid it a long time, and R neuer quinched for it, nor shewed countenaunce of feare. Thereupon Pompedius letting him downe againe, told his frends that stoode by him: O what good happe doth this child promise one day vnto ITALIE, if he liue? fure if he were a man, I beleue we should not have one voice of all the people of our fide. An other time, there were some of Catoes neere kinsemen, that keeping the feast day of his birth, bad many young boyes to supper, & amongest others this Cato. The boyes to occupie them selues till supper was ready, gathered them selues together great and small, into some private place of the house. Their play was, counterfeating pleadinges before the judges, accusing one an other, and carying them that were condemned to prison. Amongest them, a goodly young boy was caried by a bigger boy into a little chamber. bounde as a condemned person. The boy perceiuing he was locked vp, cried out vnto Cate C who mistrusting what it was, went straight to the chamber dore and putting them by by force that withstoode him to come vnto it, he tooke out the young boy, and caried him very angriby with him to his owne house, and all the other young boyes followed him also. So Cato had fuch name among the young boyes, that when Sylla made the game of young boyes running a horsebacke, which the ROMANES call Troia: to appoint them before that they might be res dy at the day of the show, he having gotten all the young boyes of noble houses together, and pointed them two Captaines. Of them, the boyes tooke the one, bicause of his mother Metella, which was the wife of Sylla: but they would none of the other called Sextus, who was nephewe to Pompey the great, neither would they be exercifed vnder him, nor followe him Wherefore Sylla asked them, which of them they would have : they all cried then Cato, and D Sextus him selfe did willingly gene him the honor, as the worthier of both. Sylla was their fathers frend, and therefore did fend for them many times to come vnto him, & he would talke with them: the which kindnes he shewed to few men, for the maiestie and great authority he had. Serpedo also (Catoes schoolemaister) thinking it a great preferrement and safetie for his fchollers, did commonly bring Cato vnto Syllaes house, to waite vpon him: the which was rether like vnto a jayle or prison, for the great number of prisoners which were dayly brought thither, and put to death, Cata being then but foureteene yeares of age, and perceiuing that fighed and mourned to fee them: he asked his schoolemaister, how it was possible the tyran scaped, that some one or other killed him not Bicause, o Serpedo, that all men seare him, more E then they hate him. Why then, replyed Cate againe, diddeft thou not gene me a fword that might kill him, to deliuer my contry of this flauery and bondage? Serpedo hearing the boy fast fo, and feeing his countenaunce and eyes on fire with choller, he maruelled much eating and 3 afterwardes had a very good eye vnto him, least rashly he should attempt some thing against Carrer love to Sylla. When he was but a little boy, some asked him whom he loued best > My brother, layed he. Then the other continuing stil to aske him, & who next he answered likewise, his brother Then the third time againe, likewise his brother. Till at length he that asked him, was weary with asking him so oft. Yea and when he was comen of age also, he then confirmed the loud he bare to his brother in his deedes. For twenty yeares together he neuer supped without his brother Capio, neither went he euer out of his house into the market place, nor into the fields F withouthim: but when his brother did noynt him felfe with sweete oyles of persume, he would none of that, and in all things elfe, he led a straight and hard life. So that his brother there were many heades brought which were fayed to be of great men, and that every bodie

A natio being commended of every man for his temperature, honefty, and fober life he grainred in deede that in respect of others, he led a sober and temperate life: but when I doe (fayd he) compare my life with my brother Catoes, methinkes then there is no difference betyext me and Sippius. This Sippius was at that time noted and pointed at, for his fine and curious effeminate life. After that Cato was once chosen Apolloes Priest, he went from his brother and tooke his portion of the goods of his father, which amounted to the fumme of a hundred and eventie talentes. Then he lived more hardly then he did before. For he fell in acquaintaunce with Antipater Tyrian, a Stoicke Philosopher, and gaue him selfe chiesly unto the studie of Antipater the morall and civill Philosophie, imbracing all exercise of vertue with suche an earnest desire, Swicke, Cathat it seemed he was prickt forward by some god: but about all other vertues, he loued the maister,

R feueritie of iustice, which he would not wrest for any gift nor fauor. He studied also to be cloquent, that he might speake openly before the people, bicause he would there should be cermine warlike forces entertained in civill Philosophie, as also in a great citie. Notwithstanding, he would not exercise it before any bodie, neither would be euer have any man to heare him speake when he did learne to speake. For when one of his frends told him one day, that men did mislike he spake so litle in company: it skilleth no matter, o he, so they can not reproue my life, for I will beginne to fpeake, when I can fay fome thing worthy to be fpoken. Hard by the market place there was the common pallace or towne house of the citie, called Basilica Porcia, the which Porcius Cato the elder had built, in the time of his Cenforship. There the Tribunes were wont to keepe their audience: and bicause there was a piller that troubled their C feates, they would either haue taken it away, or elfe haue fet it in some other place. That was the first cause that made Cato against his will to goe into the market place, and to getyp into career aff for the pulpit for orations, to speake against them : where having genen this first proofe of his e. Baston Pow loquence and noble minde, he was maruelously esteemed of. For his oration was not like a young man, counterfeating finenes of speache and affectation, but frout, full of wit and vehemency: and yet in the shortnes of his sentences, he had such an excellent grace withall, that he maruelously delighted the hearers: and furthermore, shewing in nature a certaine grauetie besides, it did so please them, that he made them laugh. He had a very full and audible voyce that might be heard of a maruelous number of people, and fuch a strong nature besides, that he neuer fainted, nor brake his speache: for many times he would speake a wholeday toge-D ther, and was neuer wearie. So when he had obtained his cause against the Tribunes, here- cause exernumed againe to keepe his former great filence, and to harden his bodie with painefull exercifes, as to abide heate, frost, and snow bare headed, and alwayer to goe a foote in the fielde, where his frendes that did accompany him rode a horsebacke, and sometime he would come and talke with one, somtime with an other, as he went a foote by them. He had a wonderfull pacience also in his fickenes. For when he had any agew, he would be alone all day long, and fuffer no man to come and fee him, vntill he perceived his fit was of him, and that he founde he was better. When he supped with his frendes and familiars, they drewe lottes who should choose their partes. If he chaunced not to choose, his frendes notwithstanding gaue him the preferrement to choose: but he refused it, saying it was no reason, sith the goddesse Kenne was

E against him. At the first he did not vieto sitte long at the table, but after he had dronke one caree drinkdraught only, he would straight rife. But when he came to be elder, he sate long at the table; ing. fo that oftentimes he would fit it out all night with his frends, till the next morning. But they feeking to excuse it, sayd, that his great busines and affaires in the common wealth was the cause of it. For following that all the day long, having no leasure nor time to studie when night came, he delighted to talke with learned men, and Philosophers, at the bord. Wherefore when Memmius on a time being in company, fayed, that Cate did nothing, but drinke all night: Giero taking his tale out of his mouth, aunswered him, thou does not adde this vnto it, that all the day he doth nothing but play at dyle. Furthermore, land being left him to the value of an hundred talentes by the death of a coufin of his, that likewife was called Cato: he put it all into ready money, to lend to his frendes that lacked, and without viury. And there were some of his frends also that would morgage his land, or his slaues, to the chamber of the city for their owne private busines: the which he him felfe would either gine the to morgage or elfe afterwards confirme the morgage of them. Furthermore, when he was comen of age to marry, having never knowen woma before, he was made fure to Lepida. This Lepida had bene precontracted vnto Metellus Scipio : but afterwardes the precontract being broken, he for fooke her, fo that the was free, when Cato was contracted to her. Notwith R standing, before Cato maried her, Scipio repenting him that he had refused her, made all the meanes he could to have her againe: & so he had, Cato tooke it so grieuously, that he thought to goe to lawe for her : but his frendes diffwaded him from it. Then feeing no other remedie, to fatisfie his angrie minde, he wrote verses against Scipio, in the which he reuiled him all he coulde : vfing the bitter tauntes of Archilocus verses, but not suche impudent, lewde, and childishe reproaches as be there. After that, he maried Attilia, Soranus daughter, being the first woman he cuer knewe: yet not the onely woman whome he did knowe, as is reported of Lalius, Scipioes frende, who therein was counted the happier, bicause all that long. time wherein he liued, he neuer knewe other woman but his first wife. Furthermore, in the warre of the bondemen (otherwife called Spartacus warre) one Gellius was chosen Prætor of C the armie vnder whom Cato ferued of his owne good will, for the loue he bare vnto his brother Gapio, who in that armie had charge of a thowfand footemen. Now Cato could not as he wished, shewe his valliant messe and good service, bicause of the insufficiencie of the Prætor that gaue ill direction. This notwithstanding, in the middest of al the riot & insolency of them in the campe, he shewing him selfe a stayed man in all his doinges, valliant where neede was, and very wife also: all men esteemed him to be nothing inferior vnto Cato the elder. Whereuppon Gellius the Prætor gaue him many honors in token of his valliantnes, which are given in reward of mens good feruice: howebeit Cate refused them, and fayd, that he was nothing worthie of those honors. These thinges made him to be thought a maruelous straunge man. Furthermore, when there was a lawe made, forbidding all men that fued for any office in the D common wealth, that they should have no prompters in any of the affemblies, to blowe into their eares the names of private citizens: he alone making fute to be Colonell of a thowfand footmen, was obedient to the law, & committed all the private citizens names to memory, to speake vnto every one of them, and to call them by their names: so that he was enuied even of them that did commend him. For, by how much they knew his deedes praiseworthie, by so muche more were they grieued, for that they could not followe them. So Cato being chosen Colonell of a thowfande footemen, he was fent into MACED ON, vnto Rubrius, Prætor there. Some fay, that at his departure from thence, his wife lamenting, and weeping to fee him go: one Munatius a frend of his fayd vnto her, take no thought Attilia, and leave weeping, for I promise thee I will kepe thy husband for thee. It is well sayd, aunswered Cato. Then when they B were a dayes iorney fro Rome, Cato after supper faid vnto this Munatius: thou must looke well to thy promeffe thou hast made Attilia, that thou wouldest keepe me for her, & therefore forfake me not night nor day. Thereupon he commaunded his men that from thence forth they should prepare two beds in his chamber, that Munatius also might lye there : who was rather pleafantly him felfe looked vnto by Cato, then Cato by him. He had fiftene flaues with him two free men, & foure of his frends, which rode, & he himselfe went a foote, somtime talking with one, otherwhile with an other as he went. When he came to the campe, where there were many legions of the Romanes, the Prætorimmediatly gaue him charge of one of them: who thinking it final honor to him for himselfe only to be valliant, sith he was but one man he practifed to make all his fouldiers under him like unto himfelfe. So dreadfull they shewed them selves to their enemies, and curreous to their frendes: fearefull to doe euill, and readie to winne honor. Whereof followed that which Cato least accounted of, that is, he wanne fame, and good will: for his fouldiers did greatly honor and love him, bicause he him selfe would ever first fee his hande to any thing he commaunded them, and bicause also both in his diet, in his apparrell, and in any iorney or paines, he was rather like vnto the meanest fouldier. then any of the other Captaines. In contrarie maneralfo, in good nature, noble corage, and eloquence, he farre exceded all the other Colonells and Captaines. So when he had spo-

In the meane time, whilest he lay at his charge in the campe, being Colonell of a thowfand footemen: his brother preparing to go into Asia,

Some did mislike this vaine charge that Cato bestowed, confidering the modestie and temperance he vsed in all things else, not regarding with judgement his tender loue and affection towards his kinsemen, which was mingled in him with his feuerity and hardnes, against all voluptuousnes, feare, and shamelesse requests. Divers cities, Princes and noble men fent him many fundrie prefents, to honor the funeralls of his brother Capio: howbeit he tooke no money of all them, fauing only spyces, and sweete sauors, & such other ornamentes, as honored the obsequies of the dead, and yet payed for them, vnto those

Furthermore, Cato being determined before he returned to Catoes iorney FROME to deale in the affaires there, to go and see AsIA, partely to be an eye witnes of the maners, customes, and power of euery prouince as he went: and partely also to fatisfie king Deiotarus request, who having bene his fathers frend, had earnestly intreated him to come and see

820 Carees mode- him: he went the iorney, and vsed it in this sorte. First, by peepe of day, he sent his baker and A cooke before, where he ment to lye that night. They comming foberly into the city or village inquiered if there were none of Catoes frends and acquaintance there, and if they found none. then they prepared his supper in an Inne, and troubled no man; but if there were no Inne, then they went to the Gouernors of the towne, and prayed them to helpe them to lodging, and did content them selves with the first that was offered them. Oftentimes the townes men did not beleue they were Catoes men, and made no accompt of them : bicaufe they tooke all things for quietly. & made no a do with the officers. Infomuch as Cato fomtime came himselfe. & found nothing ready for him, & when he was come, they made as small account of him, seeing him fet apon his cariages, and speake neuer a word: for they tooke him for some meane man, and a timerous person. Notwithstanding, sometime he called them vnto him, and tolde them. O a Doore men learne to be more curteous to receive travelling Romanes that paffe by you and looke not alwayes to haue Catoes to come vnto you : and therefore fee that you vie them with fuch curtefie & entertainment, that they may bridle the authority they have ouer you for you shall finde many that will defire no better colour nor occasion, by force to take from you than they would have: bicause you vnwillingly also do graunt them the things they would, & nede. There is a report of a pretie leaft happened him in Syria. When he came to Antioche, he found a great number of people deuided on either fide of the streete, standing a row one by an other verie decently: the young men by them felues in fayer clokes, boyes by them felues in > feemely aray, and priefts & other officers of the city also, all in white garments, crowned with garlands. Cato thought straight they had made this solemne precession to honor him, and fell c out with his men he had fent before, bicause they did suffer the to make such preparacion for his comming. So he made his frends light from their horfes, & go a foote to accompany him,

But when they came neere to the gate of the city, the mailter of these ceremonies that had as-fembled all that company (an old man, having a rodde in his hand, and a crowne on his head) came to Cato without faluting of him, and asked him only, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come. This Demetrius had bene one of Pompeis flaues, & bicause Pompeis fame was great with all men, his feruant Demetrius also was much honored and made of about his deferte, for that he was in great credit with Pompey. Catoes frendes hearing what question the Whereuppon, euerie man after that had him in great veneracion for those things, which before they despised in him, when they considered better of his noble & E curteous mind. For men that faw Pompeis entertainment towards him knew well enough that Cato was a man which he rather reuerenced, & for a kinde of duty observed, more then for any loue he bare him: & they noted further, that he honored him greatly while he was with him. but yet that he was glad when Cato went from him. For he fought to kepe backe all the young gentlemen of Rome that went to fee him, & defired them to remaine with him: but for Cate, he was nothing defirous of his company for that in his prefence he thought he could not comaund as he would, & therfore was willing to let him go, recommending his wife & his children to him, the which he neuer did before vnto any other Romane that returned to Rome howbeit in dede Cato was partly allied vnto him. After that time, all the cities whereby he paffed, deuised (in emulacion one of the other) which of the should honor him most, & made him F great feafts & bankets: in the which he prayd his freds to haue an eye to him, leaft vnwares he shold proue Curioes words true. Deiotarus letters, at the citie of Passinvnta: in the which he instantly requested him to take n them, or at the least if he would refuse them him selfe, that then he would let them be deuided amongest his frendes, fith every way they did deserve it, but specially for his fake of for that his goodes also were not so great, as could content all his frends. But Cate would not suffer them to take any iot of it more then before, although he faw well enough that there were some of them so tender harted, that they complayned of him, for that he woulde not suffer them to take any of it. For he tolde them, that otherwise, corruption and briberie could lacke no honest colour to take: and for his frends, they should alwayes have parte with him of that which was his owne justly. So he returned king Deiotarus presentes backe againe. Nowe when he was readie to imbarke, to passe ouer the sea againe vnto BRVNDVSIVN: some of his frendes perswaded him, that it was better to put the asshes of his brother Capioes bones into an other r shippe. But he aunswered them, that he would rather lose his owne life, then to leave his brothers relikes. Thereuppon he prefently hoysed sayle, and it is reported that he passed oner in great daunger, where other shippes arrived very safely. When he was returned vnto Rome, he was alwayes either talking Philosophie with Athenodorus the Philosopher, or else in the market place to pleasure his frendes. When his turne came that he was to make sure to be Quæftor, he would neuer fue for it, before he had first diligently perused all the ordinaunces touching the office of Quartor, and that he had particularly made enquierie of men of greatest Caso made office, but he presently made great alteracion amongest the clearkes and officers of the treafurie: who having the lawes and recordes in their handes, and exercising the office comn monly vnder young men which were chosen treasurers (who for their ignoraunce and lacke of experience, stoode rather in neede of maisters to teache them, then that they were able to correct others) they them selues were the officers, and controlled them. But Cato not contenting him selfe with the name and honor of the thing, did throughly understande what the clearkes and registers shoulde be, and therefore would have them to be as they ought to be, ministers vnder the Quæstors only, telling them of their briberie and corruption which they committed, and reformed them also, that fauted through ignoraunce. And when he sawe fome infolent and impudent perfons, that curried fauour with other treasurers to be against him: he caused the chiefest of them to be condemned for falsehoode, in making division betwext two coheires, and confequently turned him cleare out of his office, for ever doing a-E ny thing there any more. He accused an other also for forging of a will, whome Catalas Luttatius defending, being then Cenfor, and a man of great honor for the dignity of his office; Candles Labut chiefly for his vertue, being counted the instell man one of them in his time at Ro MH, and he was one of those also that highly commended Cato, & was conversant with him for his honest life: when he perceived that he could not defend his man by no reason, he prayed them at his request that they would pardon him. But Cato would in no wife graunt it. But Catalus earnestly. intreating still for him: then Cato plainely fayd vnto him, It is a shame for thee (Catalas) thou that art Cenfor, and shouldest reforme all our lines, thus to forget the duetie of thine office, fwere him: whether it were for shame, or anger, he went his way, & sayd neuer a word more. F Yet was not the partie condemned, though there was one voyce more that did condemne then cleere him, bicause of the absence of one of the Iudges. For Marcus Lollius, one of Catoes colleagues in the Quaftorfhip, being ficke at that time, and absent, Catulus fent vnto him, a litter after judgement genen, gane his laft voyce, which absolutely cleared him. Come this norwithflanding, would neuer whe him as a clearke, nor pay him his wages, nor would come of Lolling Novce among others . Thus having pulled downe the pride and fromacke of these clearkes, and brought them vnto reason: in short time he had all the tables and records at his commaundement, and made the treasure chamber as honorable, as the Senate it selfe so than cuery man thought, and fayd, that Cato had added vnto the Quertorthippe the dignity of the Confulthip. For finding divers men indetted before vnto the common wealth, and the common wealth also vnto divers men : he sette downe such an order; that neither the common wealth should be deceived by any man, northat any man also should have wrong of it. For being rough with the that were indetted to the chamber, he compelled them to pay their det. a and willingly & quickely also payed them to whom the chamber ought any thing: so that the people were ashamed to see some pay which never thought to have payed any thing, and on the contrary fide also others payed, which never looked to have had any parte of their dettes payed them. Furthermore, divers men did before make falle billes of their dets, and brought them so to be put into the cofer of the Quastors: and many times also his predecessors were wont of fauor and frendship to receive falle messages. For whilest he was Quastor, he never did passe away matters so lightly. For one day, he being doubtfull of a message that was sent vnto him, to knowe whether it was true or no: albeit diners men did witnesse it was true, ver would be not beleue it, vntill fuch time as the Confulls them felues came in their owne perfons to instificit was true, and to sweare, that it was so ordained. Now there were many vnto of whom Lucius Sylla being Dictator, had appointed in his fecond profcription twelve thowfand filuer Drachmas for every citizen and outlaw which they had flaine with their owne handes. These men, though every man did hate them, and knew them to be wicked people & cruell murtherers: yet no man durst offer to be reuenged of them. Cato called these men in sute, as uenged of Syllaes bloods those that did wrongfully detaine the money of the common treasure, and compelled them to repay it backe againe: sharpely reprouing (and inftly) the wicked deuelish fact they had committed. So when they had repayed the money, they were straight accused by others for murder: & as if they had bene wrongfully condemned by one judgement, they were brought into an other to the great toy of all the Romans, who then thought they faw all the tyranny of that time rooted out, and Sylla him felfe punished. Besides all this, Catoes continuall paines P and care of the treasure, was so well thought of, and liked of the people, as could be. For he was alwayes the first that came to the coffer of the treasurers, and also the last that went from thence, and was neuer wearie of any paines. Furthermore, he neuer missed to be at any asfembly of the people or Senate, fearing, and being alwayes carefull, least lightly by fauor, any money due to the common wealth should be forgiven: or else that they should abate the rent of the farmers, or that they should geue no money but to the that had justly descrued it. Thus having ridde all accusers, and also filled the coffers with treasure: he made men see, that the common wealth might be riche, without oppreffing of any man. In deede at his first comming in to the office, his colleagues and companions founde him maruelous troublesome and tedious, for that they thought him too rough and seuere : howbeit they all loued him in E the end, bicause he only withstoode the complaints and cries of all men against them (which complained that they would not for any mans respect or fauor let go the money of the common treasure) & was contented his companions should excuse them selues vnto their frends that were importunate, and lay the fault apon him, faying, that it was vnpossible for them to Cateernetable bring Cate vnto it. The last day that he went out of his office, being very honorably brought home to his house by the people : it was told him that Marcellus, being in the treasure chamber, was attempted & enuironned with many of his frends, and men of great authoritie, that were earneftly in hande with him to record a certaine gift of money, as a thing that had bene due by the common wealth. This Marcellas had bene Casoes frend even from their childhood, & whileft Cato was in office, he did orderly execute his office with him : but when he was left # alone, he was of fo gentle a nature, that he would eafily be intreated, and was as much athamed to deny any man, as he was also ouerreadie to graunt euerie man that he required. Care

But move though Cato was out of his office of Quaftor, he was not without spialls of his ment in the treasure Catoes care rhamber: who marked alwayes, and wrote what was done and passed in the treasurie. Yet at his friendes perswasions, he went first vnto his house in the contry. buttaried not long there, and returned fraight agains to ROME. When he came thither outrnight, the next morning betimes he went into the market place, & fued to be Tribune of the people, purpose ly to croffe Metellas enterprise, bicause the power & authoritie of the Tribune cosisteth more in hindring, then doing any thing; for if all men els were agreed of a matter, and that he onely were against it, the Tribune would cary it from them all. Care at the first had not many of his friendes about him, but when they heard of his intent, why he made fute for the Tribuneshing all his friends and noble men straight tooke part with him, confirmed his determination, and incoraged him to go on withall, for that he did it rather to ferue the common wealth, then his a owne turne, confidering that where many times before he might (without reliftance or deniall) have obteined the same the state being toward no trouble, he then would never sue for inbut now that he faw it in daunger, where he was to fight for the common wealth, and the protection of her libertie. It is reported that there was such a number of people about him to fanor his fute, that he was like to have ben stifled among them, & thought he should never have comen to the market place, for the preaffe of people that swarmed about him. Thus when he

If Cate D aunswered him that he did not: then he went his way and simply beleued him. So Mure ma beeing discharged by this judgement, did neuer after malice Cato for that, but so long as he remained Conful he was alwaies ruled by his counsel in all his affaires, and continued ever to honor him following his counfell in all thinges touching his office. Hereof Cato him felfe was cause, who was neuer rough nor terrible, but in matters of counsell, and in his orations before the people, for the maintenance onely of equitie and inflice: for otherwie, he was very civil & E curteous to al men. But before he entred into his Tribunethip, Cicero being yet Conful, he did The compine- helpe him in many things touching his office, but specially, in bringing Catilins conspiracie to good ende, which was a noble act done of him. For Catilin did practife a generall common, on and sturre in the common wealth, to ouerthrowe the whole state of Rome, by civill difcorde within Rome, and open warres abroade: who beeing discouered and ouercome by Cicere he was driven in the ende to flie Rome. But Lentulus, Cethegus, and many other of the accomplices of this conspiracie, blamed Catiline for his faynt and cowardly proceeding in it. For their partes, they had determined to burne the whole citie of Rome, and to put all the Empire thereof in vprore, by ftraunge warres, and rebellions of forreine nations and prouinces. Howbeit this treason being discouered, as appeareth more largely in the life of Cicero, the B matter was referred vnto the judgement of the Senate, to determine what was to bee done therein, Syllanus beeing the first who was asked his opinion therein, sayde, that he thought it

CATO VTICAN. a good they should suffer cruell paines: and after him also, all the rest said the like, vntill it came to Cefar. Cefar being an excellent spoken man, & that rather defired to nourish then to quench any fuch sturres or leditions in the common wealth, being fit for his purpose long determined of made an oration full of sweete pleasant wordes, declaring vnto them, that to put such men as them to death without lawfull condemnation, he thought it altogether vnreasonable, and rather that they should doe better to keepe them in prison. This oration of Casar so altered all the rest of the Senators minds, for that they were affraid of the people: that Syllanus self mended his opinion againe, and faid, that he ment not they should put them to death, but keepe the falt in prison, bicause that to be a prisoner, was the greatest paine a Romane Citizen could abide. Thus, the Senators minds being fo fodainly chaunged, & bent to a more fauorable fen-R tence: Catorifing vp to fay his opinion, beganne very angrily with maruelous eloquence, grie- touching Cawould to reprove Syllanus for chaunging his mind, & sharply to take vp Cafar, that vnder a po- tilinu confliguler femblance, & maske of sweete sugred words, he sought vnder hand to destroy the common wealth, and also to terrifie and make the Senate affraid: where he him selfe should have ... bene affraid, and thinke him felfe happy, if he could scape from beeing suspected, giving such ,, apparant cause of suspicion as he did, going about so openly to take the enemies and traytors .» of the common wealth out of the hands of inflice, feming to have no pitie nor compassion of " his naturall citie, of fuch nobilitie and fame, being euen brought in maner to vtter destruction, " but rather to lament the fortune of these wicked men, that it was pity they were euer borne. & " whose death preserved Rome from a thowsand murthers & mischiefs. Of all the orations that " Cener Cate made, that only was kept: for Cicero the Conful, that day had dispersed diners penne men in fundry places of the Senate house, which had maruelous swift hands, and had further raught them how to make briefe notes and abridgements, which in fewe lines shewed many ciero taught words. For vntill that time, writers were not knowen that could by figures & ciphers expresse them how to awhole sentence and word, as afterwards they could: being then the first time that euer they by notes and were found out. So Cato at that time prevailed against Casar, and made them all chaunge their figure. mindes againe, that these men were put to death. But that we may not leaue out a ior of his maners, as the very pattern and impression of his mind: It is reported, that when Cato that day was fo whot, and vehement against Cafar, that all the Senate could but looke at them, to heare them both: a letter was delivered Cafar, fent him into the house. Cato began presently to suspect Dit, and so earnestly misliked of it, that many of the Senators being offended, commaunded his letter should be seene & red openly. Cafar thereupon reached his letter vnto Cato, that sate not farre from him, When Cato had red it, and found that it was a loue letter which his fifter Servilia had written vnto Cafar, whom the loued, and had knowen: he caft it againe to Cafar, & faid, there, dronkard. After that he went on againe with his matter, which he had begon before. In fine it feemeth that Cato was very unfortunate in his wives: for this Servilia, as we have fayd, care unformhad an ill name by Cafar. And the other Seruilia alfo, which was his fifter, was worfe defamed. For the being maried vnto Lucultus, one of the greatest men of Rome, by who the had a sonne, was in the ende put away from him, for her naughty life. But worft of all, his owne wife Attilia also was not altogether cleare without suspicion: For though he had two sonnes by her, yet E he was driven to be divorced from her, she was so naught and common. After that, he maried Martia, the Daughter of Fhilip, which by report seemed to be a very honest gentlewoman. It Maria cais the that is fo famous among the ROMANES. For in the life of Cato, this place (as a fable or toes wife. comedy) is disputable, and hard to be judged. For thus it was, as Thraseas writeth: who referrethall to the report and credit of one Munatius, Catoes very famillier friend. Amonge many that loued Catoes vertues, and had them in admiration, some of them did shew him more what he was, then other some did: amongest the which, was Q. Hortensius, a man of great honestie and authoritie. He, desiring not onely to be Catoes friend and famillier, but also to joyne with him in alliance, and by affinitie to make both their houses one: was not abashed to moue him, to let him have his Daughter Porcia in mariage, (which was Bibulus wife, & had brought him F two children) that he might also cast abroade the seede of goodly children, in that pleasant fertile ground. And though to men this might seeme a straunge mind and desire, yet that in refpect of nature, it was both honest and profitable to the common wealth, not to suffer a young

Platoes felow fhip and communitie of women. woman in the prime of her youth, to lofe the frute of her wombe, being apt to beare childrens nor also that he should impouerish his sonne in lawe with moe children, then one house need ded. And further that communicating women in this fort from one to another, specially been ing bestowed apon worthy and vertuous men: that vertue should thereby bee increased the more, being so dispersed in divers families, & the citie likewise should be the stronger, by making alliances in this fort together. And if it be fo, o he, that Bibulus doe loue his wife fo dearly, that he wil not depart from her altogether, then that he would restore her to him again, when he had a child by her, that therby he might be the more bound in frendship to him, by meanes of this communication of children with Bibalus felfe, and with him. Cate auniwered him that he loued Hortenfius well, and liked of his alliance: howbeit that he maruelled he would freake to him to let him have his Daughter to get children of fith he knew that the was maried to an R other. Then Hortenfius altering his tale, stucke not to tell him his mind plainly, and to defire his wife of him, the which was yet a young woman, and Cato had children enough, But a man can not tell whether Hortenfus made this fute, bicause he saw Cato make no reckoning of Martia. for that the was then with child by him. In fine, Cato feeing the earnest desire of Hortensius, he did not dehy him her, but told him, that he must also get Philips good wil, the father of Martia. He knowing that Cato had graunted his good wil, would not therfore let him haue his daughter, before that Cato him felfe by his presence did confirme the contract & mariage with him. Though these thinges were done longe after, yet having occasion to talke of Catoes wives, I thought it not amiffe to anticipate the time. Now Lentulus, and his conforts of Catilines conspiracie being put to death: Cafar, to cloke the accusations wherewith Cato charged him in o- C pen Senate, did put him felf into the peoples hands, and gathering the rakehells and feditious persons together, which sought to set al at six and seven, he did further encorage them in their mischieuous intent & practises. Whereuppon, Cato fearing least such rabble of people should put all the common wealth in vprore & daunger: he perswaded the Senat to winnethe poore needy people that had nothing by distributing of corne amongest them, the which was done: For the charge thereof amounted yearely vnto twelve hundred and fifty talents. This liberalitie did manifestly drinke vp and quench all those troubles which they stoode in seare of. But on thother side, Metellus entring into his Tribuneship, made certen seditious orations and asfemblies, & preferred a law to the people, that Pompey the great should prefently be called into I TALY with his armie, that he should keepe the citie by his comming, from the present daun-D ger of Catilins conspiracie. These were but words spoken for facions sake, but in deede the law had a fecret meaning, to put the whole common wealth and Empire of Rome into Pompers hands. Hereuppon the Senate affembled, wherein Cato at his first comming, spake somewhat gently, and not to vehemently against Metellus, as his maner was to be sharpe vnto them that were against him; but modestly perswaded him, and fell to intreate him in the end, and highly to extoll his house, for that they had alwaies taken part with the Senate and nobilitie. But Metellus therewith tooke fuch pride & conceit of him felfe, that he began to despise Cato, thinking he had vied that mildnes, as though he had beene affraide of him: infomuch as he gaue out prowd speeches against him, and cruell threats, that in despite of the Senate he would do that which he had vndertaken. Then Cato chaunging his countenaunce, his voice and speech, after E he had spoken very sharply against him: in the ende he roughly protested, that while heliued, he would neuer fuffer Pompey to come into Rome with his armie. The Senate hearing them both, thought neither of both well in their witts, but that Metellus doings was a furie, which proceeding of a cancred from the and extreame malice, would put all in hazard: & that which Cato did, was a rauishment and extacy of his vertue, that made him beside him selfe contending for inflice and equitie. When the day came that this law should paffe by voyces of the people, Metellus fayled not to be in the market place with a worlde of straungers, flaues, and fenfers, armed, and fet in battell raye, befides a number of the common people that were defirous to fee Pompeys returne, hoping after chaunge. Besides all those, Casar then being Prætor, gaue ayde likewise with his men, in the behalf of Metellus. On the contrary part also, the noble F men and Senators of the citie were as angry as Cato, and faid it was a horrible shame: howbeit they were his friendes, rather in misliking the matter, then in defending the common wealth.

Iulius Cafar Prasor.

Whereuppon, all his friendes at home, and his whole family, were maruailoully perplexed & forowfull, that they both refused their meate, and also could take no rest in the night for seare of Cato. But he, as one without feare, having a good hart with him, did comfort his people, and had them not forow for him; and after he had supped, as he commonly vsed to doe, he went to bed, and flept foundly all night, till the morning that Minutius Thermus, his colleague & fellow Tribune, came & called him. So they both went together into the market place, accomnanied with a very few after them: Whereuppon divers of their friends came and met them by the way & bad them take heede vnto them selues. When they were come into the market place, and that Cato faw the temple of Caftor and Pollux full of armed men, and the degrees or fleppes kept by fword players and fenfers, and Metellus on the top of them fet by Cafarturning n to his friends he fayd, see I pray you the coward there, what a number of armed men he hath gotten together, against one man naked, and vnarmed. Therewithall he straight went forward with his companion Thermus vnto that place, and they that kept the degrees, opened of them selues to let him passe, but they would let no other goe vp but him selse: But Cato with much adoc, taking Minutius by the hand, got him up with him, and when he was come up, he fare course and him downe betwixt Metellus and Cafar, to keepe them a fonder, that they should not whisper conflancie. one in anothers eare. Neither of them both could tell what to fay to him. Whereuppon the noble men that confidered Catoes countenaunce and boldnes, wondring to fee it, drew neare, and by their cryes willed him not to be affrayd, but encoraged one another to sticke by him, that stoode for defence of their libertie. So, there was a seruaunt that tooke the written law in Chis hand, and would have red it to the people: but Cato woulde not let him . Then Metellus tooke it him felfe in his handes to reade it: but Cate also snatched it out of his handes. Metellus notwithstanding, having it perfect without booke, would needes declare the effect of it by harte. But Thermus clapped his hande before his mouthe to keepe him that he shoulde not fpeake. Metellus feeing thefe two men bent by all meanes to keepe this law from passing, and that the people did leane on their side: he beckned to his men to goe for the armed men which were at home in his house, that they should come with terror and cryes to make them affrayd, and so they did. The people thereuppon were dispersed here and there for feare, that Cato was left alone in the market place, and they threwe stones at him from beneath. But then Murana, who had before accused Cato for buying of the Consulthippe, for sooke him not in D that daunger, but holding his longe gowne before him, cryed out vnto them beneath, that threwe at Cato, to leave. So shewing him thedaunger he had brought him selfe vnto, holding him still by the armes, he brought him into the temple of Castor and Pollux. Then Metellus feing the pulpit for orations voyded, and his enemies flying out of the market place, he thought he had wonne the gole: Whereuppon commaunding his fouldiers to depart, then proceeding gently, he attempted to passe his lawe. But his enemies that sled for feare, being gathered againetogether in the market place, beganne a freshe to cry out against Metellus, with greater boldnes and corage then before. Then Metellus and his adherents being affrayd and amazed, doubting that their enemies had gotten weapons, and were prouided, and therefore were the bolder: they fled, and all of them left the pulpit for orations. So, when Metellus and his E company were gonne, Cato came agayne to the pulpit for orations, and greatly commended the people for the good will they had shewed, and perswaded them to continue in their well doing. Whereuppon the common people were then against Metellus, and the Senate also being affembled gaue order, that Gate should have better ayde then he had before, and that by all meanes possible they should resist Metellus lawe, which onely tended to moue sedition & civill warre in Ro MB . For Metellus selfe, he was yet vehemently bent to followe his attempt and enterprise : but perceiuing that his friendes were maruelously affraide of Cato, as a man whom they thought inuincible, he fodainely came into the market place, and affembling the people, told them many reasons in his oration, supposing to bringe Cate in disgrace with the people, and amongest other thinges he fayd, that he would withdraw him selfe out of this ty-Frannicall power of Catoes, and his conspiracie against Pompey, the which peraduenture the citie before it were long, should repent, for that they had shamed and defaced so noble a man. After that, he presently departed Rome, and went into A stato informe Pompey of all this

mon wealth from the great trouble of fuch a foolish Tribune, and by ouerthrowing Meteller he had also suppressed the power of Pompey. But he was yet much more commended, when he was against the Senate, who would have noted Metellus of infamie, and deprived himse his office, the which he would not fuffer them to doe. The common people thought him of a curreous and gentle nature, bicause he would not treade his enemie vnder his foote, when he had the upper hand of him, nor be reuenged of him when he had ouercome him; but wife me iudged it otherwise, that it was wisely done of him not to prouoke Pompey. About this time returned Lucullus from the warre, of the which it semed that Pompey had taken the honor & glory from him for the ending of it, & was likely also to have bene put from his honor of triumph. for that Caius Memmius was his adverfary, who layed many accusations against him before p the people, rather to please Pompey, then for any malice els he had towards him. But Cate both for that Lucullus was his brother in law, and had maried his owne fifter Servilia, as also for that he faw they did him wrong: refilted this Memmius, & defended many accusations against him. So that in the end, though Memmius had labored that Cato should be deprived of his office.as from a tyrannicall power: yet Cato compelled Memmius at the last to leaue of his accusations. and to profecute law no more against him. Thus Lucullus having obteined honor of triumph, did embrace Catoes friendship more then before taking him for a fure bulwarcke & defense against the power of Pompey the great. But Pompey shortly after returning home againe, with great honor from his conquests, trusting that for respect of his welcome he should be denved nothing at the peoples hands when he came home: fent before vnto the Senate, to pray them of for his fake to deferre the election of the Confuls, vntill he came to Rome, that being preferr he might fauor Piloes fute, fuing to be Conful. Thereunto the most part of the Senate gaue their consent, but Cate on thother side was against it, not that the deferring of the time wasa matter of fuch importance, but to cut all hope from Pompey to goe about to attempt any newe deuifes, infomuch that he made the Senate chaunge opinion againe, and Pompeys request was denied. Pompey being maruelously troubled withall, and perceiving that Cato would be against him in all things if he found not some deuile to winne him : he sent for his friend Munatius, by his meanes to demaind Catoes two Neces of him which were mariable: the eldeft for him felf. & the voilgest for his sonne. Others say also, that they were not his Neces, but his own daughters. Munatius did Pompeys meffage, & brake the matter vnto him, his wife, & to his fifters, who p maruelously defired Pompeys alliance, for the greatnes and dignitie of hisperson. But Cato making no farther delay, without other deliberation, as not greatly pleased with the motion, aunfwered him prefently. Munatius, goe thy way vinto Pompey againe, and tell him that Cato is not to be wonne by women, though otherwife I mislike not of his friendship: and withall, that so long as he shall deale verightly in all causes, & none otherwise, that he shall find him more affuredly his friend, then by any alliance of mariage: & yet, that to fatisfie Pompeys pleasure and will against his contry, he wil neuer give him such pledges. The women and his friends at that time were angry with his aunswer & refusall, saying, it was too stately and vncurteous. But afterwardes it chaunced, that Pompey fuing to have one of his friendes made Conful, he fenta great fumme of money to brybe the voyces of the people, which liberalitie was noted, & fpo- H ken of bicause the money was told in Pompeys owne garden. Then did Cato tell the women of his house, that if he had now bene bound by allyance of mariage vnto Pompey, he should then haue bene driven to have bene partaker of Pompeys shamefull acts. When they heard whather had told them, they all confessed then that he was wifer to refuse such alliance, then they were that wifhed and defired it. And yet, if men thould sudge of wifedom, by the fucceffe and event of things. I must needes say, that Cato was in great fault for refusing of this allyance. For thereby he was the cause of Pompeys matching with Cafar, who ioyning both their powers together was the whole destruction of the Empire of Rome: Whereas peraduenture it had not fallen our fo, if Cato fearing Pompeys light faultes, had not caused him by increasing his power with another to commit farre greater faultes. Howbeir those thinges were yet to come. Fur # thermore, Pompey being at latte with Lucullus, touching certain ordinances which he had made in the Realme of Pontvs, bicause both the one and the other would have their ordinances to

But Cato stowtly resisting that lawe agayne, he put it by , and made Pompey thereby in a rage to acquaynte him felfe with Publics Clodius , the moste seditious and boldest person of all the Tribunes, and besides that, made allyance enen at that tyme with Cafar, whereof Cato him felfe was the onely Author. Cafar returning out of SPAYNE from his Prætorshippe, required the honour of tryumphe, and withall made fute to bee Confull. But beeing a lawe to the contrary, that they that fued to bee Confulls shoulde bee present them selves in the citie, and suche also as desired honour of triumphe, shoulde bee without the citie: he earnestly required the Senate, that he myght ne for the Confulthippe by his friendes. The moste parte of the Senate were willing vntoit, but Cato was flatly agaynst it. He perceyuing that the other Senatours were willing to gratifie Cafar, when it came to him to deliuer his opinion, he spent all the whole daye in his oration, and by this pollicie preuented the Senate, that they coulde not conclude any thinge. Then Cafar letting fall his tryumphe, made fute to be Confull, and entring the cine joyned friendshippe with Pompey. Hereuppon he was chosen Consul, and immediatly aftermarved his Daughter Iulia vnto Pompey: and so having made in manner a conspyracie betwint Casar agaynft the common wealth betweene them felues, Cafar preferred the lawe Agraria, for and Pomper. distributing the landes vnto the Citizens, and Pompey was present to mainteyne the publicacion thereof. Lucullus and Cicero on thother fide taking parte with Bibulus the other Conc full, did what they coulde agaynst it, but specially Cato: who fearing muche this allvance of Cafar and Pompey, that it was a pacte and conspiracie to ouerthrowe the common wealth. fayde, that he cared not so muche for this lawe Agraria, as he feared the rewarde they looked for, who by fuche meanes dyd intife and please the common people. Therewithall. the Senate were wholly of his opinion, and so were many other honest men of the people belides, that were none of the Senate, and tooke his parte: maruailing muche, and also beeing offended with Cafars greate vnreasonablenes and importunitie, who by the authoritie of his Confulshippe did preferre suche thinges, as the moste seditiousest Tribunes of the people were wont commonly to doe, to currye fauour with the people, and by fuche vile meanes fought to make them at his commaundement. Wherefore, Cafar and his friends D fearing fo greate enemies, fell to open force. For to beginne with all, as the Conful Bibulus was going to the market place, there was a basket of donge powred vppon his heade: and furthermore, the Officers roddes were broken in their handes, which they carried before him. In fine, dartes were throwen at them out of euery corner, and many of them beeing hurt, they all at length were driven to five, and leave the market place. But Cato, he came laste of all, keeping his wonted pace, and often cast backe his heade, and curfed such Citizens . So they did not onely passe this lawe Agraria by voyces of the people, but surthermore they added to it: that all the Senate shoulde bee sworne to stablishe that lawe. and bee bounde to defende the fame, (if any attempted the alteracion thereof) vppon greate penalties and fines to bee fette on his heade, that shoulde refuse the othe. All E the other Senators sware agaynst their wills, remembring the example of the mischiese that chaunced vnto the olde Metellus, who was banished out of ITALY, bicause he would not sweare to suche a like lawe. Whereuppon, the women that were in Casees house, befought him with the teares in their eyes, that he woulde yeelde and take the othe: and fo did also divers of his friendes besides. Howebeit, he that moste inforced and ciero by his brought Cato to sweare, was Cicero the rator: who perswaded him, that peraduenture gration brake he woulde bee thought vnreasonable, that beeing but one man, he shoulde seeme to mislike that, which all other had thought meete and reasonable: and that it were a sonde parte of him wilfully to put him felfe in fo greate daunger, thinking to hynder a matter already paste remedie. But yet that besides all this, a greater inconvenience woulde happen, if The forfooke his contrye (for whose sake he did all these thinges) and left it a praye vnto them, which fought the vtter subuersion of the same, as if he were glad to bee ridde from the trouble of defending the common wealth. For, fayde he, though Cato have which, Cicero fayde he was the thiefe, and was moste maliced of P. Clodius the Tribune, who fought to drive him out of the contrye. It is fayde that Cato beeing wome by these like wordes and perswasions at home, and openly in the market place, they so fofetned him, that he came to take his othe laste of all men, but one Phaonius, a very friende Cato committed to prifor by Cafar.

P.Clodius, Tribune of the people. The crafty swixs Cafar

Cato fent Am

of his. Cafars harte beeing then lift vppe, for that he had brought his first purpose to paffe: beganne nowe to preferre an other lawe, to divide all CAMPANIA, and the comtrye called TERRA DI LAVORO, (the lande of labour) vnto the poore needy people of Rome, and no man stoode against him but Cato. Whereuppon Casar made his officers to take him from the pulpit for orations, to cary him to prison. All this made not Cato stowne. nor leave his franke speeche, but as he went he still spake against this edicte, and per- n fwaded the people to beware of them that preferred fuche lawes. All the Senate, and the beste force of Citizens followed Cato with heavy hartes, shewing by their silence. that they were offended and angrye for the injurye they did vnto him, beeing so worthy a man. Insomuch as Casars selfe perceived that the people were offended with it, and ver of ambition & stomacke, he looked alwayes when Cato would have appealed vnto the people. So when he faw that Cato ment no fuch matter, at length ouercomen with shame and dishonor, he him felfe procured one of the Tribunes to take Cato from the Sergeaunts. In fine, all Cafars practife tended to this ende, that when he had wonne the peoples fauor by fuch lawes: they should then graunt him the government of all the GAVLE (aswell on this side, as bewond the mountaines) and all ILLYRIA, with an armie of four legions, for the space of fine c yeares, notwithstanding that Cato told the people before, that they them selues with their own voyces did fet vppe a tyrant, that one day would cut their throats. They did also chuse Publius Clodius Tribune of the people, which was of a noble house: a thing directly contrary to the law, But this Clodius had promifed them, fo that they would helpe him to banish Cicero out of Rome, to do all that he could for them. Furthermore, they made Calphurnius Pifo (Cafars wifes father) and Gabinius Paulus, (a man wholly at Pompeys commaundement, as they write which knew his life and manners) Confuls the next yeare following. Now, not with standing they had the rule of the common wealth in their owne handes, and that they had wonne parte of the citie with brybes, and the other parte also with feare: yet they were both affraid of Cato, when they confidered what trouble they had to ouercome him, which they did very hardly not-n withstanding, and to their great shame, beeing driven to vse force, and yet thought they should neuer haue done it. Furthermore, Clodius vtterly dispaired that he could possibly banish Cicero, so longe as Cato was there. So deuising wayes howe to doe it, when he had taken possession of his office, he sent for Cato, and beganne to tell him, that he thought him the honestest and justest man of Rome, and that he was ready to performe it to him by deede. For where many made fute vnto him to be fent into CYPRVs, to make warre with king Ptolong: he thought none fo worthy as him felfe, and therefore for the goodwill he bare him, he was very willing to offer him that pleasure. Cato strayght cryed out with open mowth, that this was a deuise to intrappe him, not to pleasure him. Then Clodius prowdly and siercely aunswered him, well, seeing thou wilt not goe with good will, thou shalt goe then against E thy will: and so he did . For at the first affemblye of the citie, he caused the people to graunt his commission for his iorney thither: but they neyther appoynted him shippes, nor souldiers, nor any other Ministers to goe with him, fauing two Secretaries onely, of the which, the one of them was a very villayne and arrant theefe, and the other, one of Clodius followers. Besides all this, as if they had appoynte him but litle to doe in CYPRVS against Ptolomy, he made them commaunde him after that, to goe and restore the outlawes and banishedmen of the citie of EYZANTIVM, vnto their contrye and goodes agayne, of purpose onely to keepe Cato farre enoughe from Rome, whylest he continued Tribune. Cato been ing driven by necessitie to obeye, he counselled Cicero (whome Clodius pursued) to beware that he made no sturre agaynst him, for seare of bringing Rome into civill warre and murther for his fake: but rather, to absent him selfe, that he might an other tyme preserve his contrye. After that, he fent his friende Canidius before into CYPRVS, vnto Ptolomye, to a nerswade him to bee quiet without warre: declaring vnto him, that he shoulde nether lacke honour nor riches, for the Romanes woulde graunt him the priesthoode of Venus in the citie of PAPHOS. Cate in the meane tyme remayned in the Ile of RHODES. preparing him felfe there, and abyding his aunswer. In the tyme of these sturres, Ptolomy king of AGYPT, for Ptolomy king a certen offence and discorde with his subjectes, departing out of ALEXANDRIA, sayled to- of AEgypt, wardes Rome, hoping that Cafar and Pompey with a greate armie woulde restore him to his Case. crowne and kingdome agayne. He beeing defirous to fee Cato, fent vnto him, supposing he woulde come at his fending for. Cate by chaunce was occupyed at that tyme about some busines, and badde the Messenger will Ptolomy to come to him, if he woulde see him. So when Ptolomy came, he nether went to meete him, nor rose vppe vnto him, but onely weln comed him, and badde him fitte downe. It amazed the king at the first to see vnder so simple and meane a trayne, fuche a statelines and maiestie in Catoes behauior. But when he hearde him boldely talke with him of his affayres, and fuche graue talke come from him, reprouing his follye he had committed, to for fake suche princely pleasure and wealth, to goe and subiect him felfe vnto fuche dishonour, suche extreame paynes, and suche passing greate giftes and prefents, as he shoulde throwe awaye, to satisfie the conetournes of the rulers at Rome, the which was fo vnfatiable, that if all the Realine of AGYPT were converted into filuer to give amonge them, it woulde fearce suffice them: in respect whereof, he counfelled him to returne backe with his nauve, and to reconcile him felfe agayne with his fubjectes, offering him felfe also to goe with him, to helpe to make his peace. Then Ptolomy comming to him felfe, and repenting him of his follye, knowing that Gato tolde him truely, and wifely: he determined to followe his counfell, had not his friendes turned his mynde to the contrarye. So when Ptolomy came to Rome, and was driven to wayte at the gates of the Magistrates that were in authoritie: he sighed then, and repented his follye, for that he had not onely despised the counsell of a wise man, but rather the Oracle of a god. Furthermore, the other Ptolomy that was in CYPRVS (a happye turne for Cato) poyloned him felfe. Cato beeing also informed that he lefte a wonderfull fumme of money behynde him, he determined to goe him selfe vnto BYZANTIVM, and sent his Nephewe Brutus into CYPRVS, bicause he durst not truste Canidius so farre. Then hauing restored the banished men vnto the peoples fauour agayne, settinge agreement D betwirt them, he returned into Cyprvs. There he founde a maruailous greate trea- caree difffure, and plate bothe of golde and filuer, tables, precious stones, hanginges, and purple filkes, all the which he was to make readye money of. There he tooke greate care prus. and paynes to rayle all thinges to the vimolte and dearest pryces that coulde bee, and he him felfe was present at all, to keepe reckoning of the laste penney. Wherefore, to bringe this to passe, he woulde not stande to the common vse of the sale of the cryer, but suspected them all, bothe cryers, prayfers, and his owne friendes, and therefore talked him felfe with the prayfers, and made them fette highe pryfes vppon euery thinge that was to bee folde. And thus were the moste parte of the goodes folde and caryed awaye, at the dearest pryces. This did maruelously offende the moste of his friendes, The emy be-E when they sawe that he did mistruste them: but Munatius specially, his dearest friende, mixt Cato & tooke it so inwardely, that he thought neuer to bee friendes with him agayne. Insomuche as in the booke Cafar wrote agaynst Cato, in this place he forceth moste the accusation agaynst him. Munatius notwithstanding wryteth, that he was not angrye so muche with Cato for that he mystrusted him, but for a certayne disdayne he had him selfe of Cato, and for the emulacion betwixt him and Canidius. For Munatius wrote 2 booke of Catoes deedes and fayinges, whome Thraseas in his historye chiefly followed.

In this booke he sheweth that he came late into Cyprys, and was very ill lodged. And furthermore also, that when he woulde have comen into Catoes house, they kept him out of the gates, for that Cato was busie, doing some thinge with Canidius. He modestly complay-

I doe rather employe him for his skill and faithfulnes in thinges, then any man els: for that A he hath beene with me from the beginning, and as farre as I learne, was never brybed, but cleane handed still. These wordes Cato tolde Munatim secretly betweene them two: buras. terwardes he knewe that he had also reported them vnto Canidius. When he sawe that he would no more go and suppe with Cato as he was wont, and when he was also called to counfell, he would not come there nether. Wherefore Cato threatned him, that he would feafe voon all his goods and carriage, as they vie to handle them that are disobedient vnto inflice. This notwithstanding, Munatius cared not for it, but tooke sea, and returned againe to Rome, bearing Cato grudge a long time. Then Martia, being at that time Catoes wife, spake with him, and were both bidden to supper together, vnto a friend of theirs, called Barca. Thereuppon Cato al. fo arrived, and came thither, when they were all fette at supper, and asked where he should sit, B Barea tolde him agayne, where it pleased him. Then casting his eyes about, he sayd he would fitte by Munating: and so fetching a compasse about the borde, he went and sate by him.but offered him no friendshippe and familiaritie all supper tyme. Afterwardes notwithstanding, at the request of Martia, that was earnestly in hande with Cato for him: he wrote vnto him, and willed him to come and speake with him. Munatius went to Catoes house in the morning, where Martia stayed him, and kept him companie, vntill all the rest that came to salute Cato, were departed. Then Cato comming to him, embraced him in his armes, and made very muche of him. We have the willinglier dilated this matter at length, bicause mens natures and manners might be discerned even in these small matters of friendshippe privately, as otherwise in the greatest publicke causes. Now touching Catoes commission, he gottetogether litle leffe then feuen thowfand filuer talents. Furthermore, fearing the farreneffe of sen togesher the jorney he had to goe by fea, he made divers litle cofers, and put into every one of them two talents, and five hundred Drachmas, and tyed vnto eache of them a longe rope, and a greate peece of corcke: bicause that if the shippe should fortune to miscarye, those corckes might showe where the chestes with money laye in the bottome of the sea. Thus was all the money faued, fauing a litle, and brought fafely to Rome. Cate having made two bookes wherin he had noted all thinges done in his jorney, he could neither faue thone nor thother of them. For one of his bondmen made free called Philargyrus, tooke the one away: who taking shippe at the hauen of Cenchrees, was him felfe drowned, and the booke he had alfo, loft with him, The other booke which he him felfe had kept, vntill he came vnto Corrov: he lying in the n market place of the citie in his tents, which he caused to be set vppe: the Mariners being very cold in the night, made fo great a fire, that it burnt the tents, stuffe, booke and all. Notwithstanding he brought certaine of the late king Ptolomyes flaues with him, who while he lived, had the charge and custodie of all histreasure and riches, the which he brought as witnesses, to stoppe the mouthes of his malicious enemies, that would have accused him in any thinge, But yet the loffe of them did grieue him, not fo much for the greate care and paynes he had taken in fetting downe the accompt of his charge, for the inftification and proofe of his fidelitie and good feruice: but also, for that they might have ferued for a good memoriall and example vnto all others, to have bene a like carefull in their charge, as him felf. But the goddes denyed him this good happe. Newes beeing brought that he was come to Rome by water, E when they understood that he was at hand, by and by all the Magistrats, the Priestes, the Senate, & the most part of the people also went out to meete him by the rivers side : so that both fides of the river of Tyber were full of people, and the receiving of him in, feemed not inferior to the entry of a triumphe. Notwithstanding, some thought him very presumptuous, that the Confuls and Prætors comming out to meete him, he did not stay his gally, but rowed still yp the streame (beeing in a kinges galley of fix owers to euery bancke) and neuer stayed, vntill all his fleete arryued in the hauen. This notwithstanding, when the cofers with mony were carried thorough the market place into the treasure chamber, the people wondred to see so great a quantitie of it. And thereuppon the Senate being affembled, with great and honorable words they gaue Cato an extraordinary Prætorship, and priviledge also, at any common sports # to weare a purple gowne. Cato refused all these honours, and onely befought the Senate to make Nicias a free man, Steward of the late diseased king Ptolomy, being a witnes of his faith into Rome with great she people.

A and great paynes he had taken in this service. Philip the father of Martia, was that yeare Conful so that after a forte, the authoritie of the Conful was in Gato: bicause Lentulus, colleague and fellowe Conful with Philip, did no leffe renerence Cato for his vertues, then Philip did for his allyance with him . Furthermore, when Cicero was restored agayne from his banishment, the which Fublius Clodius (beeing then Tribune of the people) had put apon him, and beeing agayne growen to great credit: he went one day into the Capitoll, in the absence of Clodius. by force to take awaye the tables which Clodino had confecrated there, in the which were comprised all his doings during the tyme he was Tribune. Thereuppon the Senate beeing afsembled, Clodius did accuse Cicero of this violent facte. Cicero aunswered him agayne: that hicause Clodius was chosen Tribune, directly against the lawe, therefore all his doings were B voyde, and of no validitie. Then stoode vppe Cato, and say de; he knewe that all that which clodius did when he was Tribune, was scantly good and allowable, but yet if generally any man shoulde vindoe all that he had passed by that authoritie: then all that he him selfe had done likewise in CYPRVS, must of necessitie bee renoked. For the commission that was oraunted vnto him (by vertue whereof he had done many thinges) (houlde be vnlawfull: bicause the Tribune also that did graunt it him, was not lawfully chosen. And therefore, that Publius Clodius was not made Tribune agaynst the lawe, who by consent of the lawe was taken out from a noble house, and made a populer person: howebeit, if he had behaued him felfe vinduetifully in his office, as other men that happely had offended: then he was to be accused to make him mend his faulte, and not to destroye the authoritie of the officer, which in r it selfe was lawfull. After that, there fell misliking betwixt Cicero and Cato, for this counter buffe he had given him: and Cicero continued a long tyme after, before he did shewe him any countenaunce of friendshippe as he had at other tymes done. But afterwardes they were reconciled together agayne, by this occasion. Pompey and Crassus having bene with Casar to talke with him (who for that purpose came out of GAVLE beyond the Alpes) made an agreement there betwixt them, to demaund the second Consulthip together, and when they had it, then to proroge Cafars government for five yeares more, and also they woulde have the best prouinces and greatest, for them selves, with great armies, and money enough to paye them with . This was in deede a playne conspiracie to denide the Empire of Rome betweene them, and veterly to ouerthrow the state of the common wealth. At that time there were ma-D ny noble men, which came to make fute for the Confulthip. But when they fawe Pompey and Crassus offer to make sute for it, all the reste gaue ouer, but Lucius Domitius that had marved Porcia, Catoes fifter: through whose perswassion he woulde not relinquishe his sute, considering that it was not the office onely of the Confulship that was the chiefest matter of importance, but the libertie of the Senate and people. Straight there ranne a rumor through the most parte of the people, that they were not to suffer Pompeys power to be joyned with Craffus, by meanes of this office: for then his authoritie woulde beetoo great and stronge, and therefore, that of necessitie one of these two were to bee denyed. For this cause therefore, the good men tooke Domitius parte, and did encourage him to goe on with his fute, affuring him of ayde vnder hande of divers, which durst not bee seene openly for seare of those two E great men, who at the daye of the election would procure him voyces in his fauour. Pompey and Crassus mistrusting this, made Domitius bee sette uppon, going with torche light before daye into the fielde of Mars, where the election was alwayes made: and first striking the torche bearer that went before him, they hurt him fo fore, that he fell downe deade at his feete. Then they layed at the rest in like case, who finding them selves cruelly hurt, ranne awave enery man of them, and left Domitius and Cato polt alone. But Cato, notwithstanding he was hurt in one of his armes, still helde Domitius fast, and prayed him to tary, and not to leave to defende the libertie of their contrie, agaynst tyrants, which playnely shewed after what manner they woulde gouerne, fithe by fuche wicked meanes they afpyred to tyrannicall gouernment. All this notwithstanding, Domitius woulde targe no lenger, but betooke F him to his legges, and ranne home. Thus were Crassus and Pompey without denyall proclaymed Confuls. Gato neuer yeelded therefore, but came and fued to bee Prætor, bicaufe that PVhy Care thereby he might yet make it some strength and countenaunce to him against their Conful- Preser. AAAA iij

the first Tribe beeing called to give their voyces, declared him Prætor. Pompey seeing that. straight brake of the affemblye, making a shamefull lye, telling that he heard it thunder: the which the ROMANES doe maruelously detest, and will conclude nothing when it thundereth. Howebeit afterwardes they gaue more money, then they had done before, and thereby draue awaye the chiefest men out of the fielde of Mars, and by practife obtayned, that Vatinius was chosen Prætor for Cato. And thereporte went, that they that had so wickedly given their voyces, feeling them felues pricked in conscience, fledde immediatly out of the fielde: and the honest men that remayned, were both very fory and angrie, for the injurie they had offered Cato. At that tyme one of the Tribunes keeping an affemblye of the citie. Cato stoode vppe, and tolde (as if he had prophecied) before them all, what woulde happen to the common wealth by these practises, and stirred vppe the people agaynst Pomper, and Cafar, faying: that they were giltye of those thinges, and therefore procured them to bee done, bicause they were affrayde that if Caso had beene Prætor, he would too narrowly have fifted out their deuises. In fine, Cate going home to his house, had more companye to wayte vppon him alone, then all the other Prætors that had beene chosen. When Caius Treboniw, Tribune of the people, had preferred a lawe for the deuiding of the provinces vnto the newe Confuls, SPAYNE and AFRICKE vnto the one, and ÆGYPT and SYRIA vnto theother, with full power to make warre as they thought good bothe by sea and lande: all other D men having no hope to keepe it backe, did let it alone, and spake nothing to contraryeit. Then Cato getting vppe into the pulpit for orations, before the people beganne to give their voyces, coulde hardely haue two howers space to speake: but at length, they perceyuing that he delayed tyme by foretelling thinges to come, woulde fuffer him to speake no longer, but fent a Sergeaunt to him, and plucked him by force out of the pulpit. But when he was beneath, and cryed out notwithstanding, and divers gave good eare vnto him: the Sergeaunt went to him agayne, and tooke him, and caryed him out of the market place. Howebeit the Officer had no sooner left him, but he went strayght towardes the pulpit for orations, and there cryed out more vehemently then before, and willed the people to have an eye to ayde the libertie of their common wealth, which went to ruine. When he oftentymes toge- E ther did this. Trebonius the Tribune being madde withal, commaunded his Sergeaunt to cary him to prison. The people followed him hard notwithstanding, to heare what he sayd vnto them. Whereuppon Trebonius fearing some sturre, was forced to commaund his Sergeaunt to let Cato goe. So Cato draue of all that day without any matter concluded. The next morning notwithstanding, the contrary faction having partly put the ROMANES in feare, and wome the other parte also by fayre wordes and money, and by force of armes likewise kept Aquilius, one of the Tribunes, from comming out of the Senate: and after they had also violently driven Cato out of the market place, for faying that it thundred, and having hurt many men, and also flayne some out of hande in the market place: in the ende they forcibly passed the decree by voyces of the people. Many beeing offended therewith, went a company of them p together to plucke downe Pompeys images: but Cato would not fuffer them. And afterwardes also, when they preferred an other law for the prorogacion of the prouinces & armies which

A Cefar demaunded : Cato would speake no more to the people to hinder it, but protested vnto Cato foresbepompey him selfe, that he saw not how he plucked Cafar apon him, and that he should feele the the shings weight of his force before he looked for it: and then when he could neither fuffer nor remedy which bapper it he would even cast his burden and him selse apon the common wealth, and too late would ned vinto remember Catoes warnings, which were privately as profitable for Pompey, as openly just and for reasonable for the comon wealth. Cato vsed many of these perswasions fundry times vnto him, but Pompey neuer made accompt of them: for he woulde not be perfeaded that Cafar would ener change in that forte, and besides he trusted too much to his owne power and prosperitie. Furthermore, Cato was chosen Prætor for the next yeare following, in the which it appear cato chosen red (though he ministred instice vprightly) that he rather defaced and impaired the maiestie Pretor. R and dignitie of his office, then that he gaue it grace and countenaunce by his doings: for he would oftentimes go a foote barelegged, and without any coate, vnto his Prætors chaire, and there geue sentence of life and death, otherwhiles of men of great account. And some report, that he would geue audience when he had dyned, and dronke wine : but that is vntrue. Now Caso prefer-Cato perceiving that the citizens of Rome were marred by bribes and gifts of those, which a- red alan for foired vnto offices, and that the people made it an arte and facultie to gaine by: to roote this bing. vice altogether out of the common wealth, he perswaded the Senate to make a law, that such as hereafter should be chosen Consults or Prators, should (if there were no man to accuse them) come and offer them felues before the judges, and taking their othe, should truely declare what meanes they had vied to attaine to their office. This offended the futers for the C offices, but much more the mercenarie multitude. VV hereuppon, a great number of them went in a morning together where he kept his audience, and all cried out voon him, reuiled him, and threw stones at him: infomuch as they that were there, were forced to flie thence, and him felfe also was driven out of the place by the prease of people, and had much a doe to get to the pulpit for orations, where standing on his feete, he presently pacified the tumult of the people, by the boldnes and constancie of his countenaunce only. Then when all was pacified by the present perswasions he vied, aprly spoken to purpose for the instant, they geuing attentiue care, without sturre or vprore. The Senate geuing him great commendacion therefore, he told them roundly and plainly: but I have no cause to praise you to leave a Prætor in fuch daunger of his life, offering no aide to helpe him. But the futers for the offices, they D were in a maruelous case: for one way, they were affrayed to geue money to buy the peoples voyces, and on thother fide, they were affraied also if any other did it, that they should go without their fute. So they were all agreed together, every man to put downe twelve Myriades & a halfe a peece, and then they should make their fute justly & vprightly : and who focuer were taken fauty, and that had otherwise made his way by corruption, that he should lose the money he had layed downe. This agreement being concluded between them, they chose Cato(as it is reported) for their arbitrator, and keeper of all the same money. This match was made in Catoes house, where they all did put in caution or furcties to aunswere the money: the which he tooke, but would not meddle with the money. The day being come, Cato affilting the Tribune that gouerned the election, and carefully marking howe they did geue their voyces: he E spied one of the suters for the office breake the accord agreed upon, and condemned him to pay the forfeiture vnto the rest. But they greatly commending his instice and integritie, forgaue the forfeiture, thinking it punishment enough vnto him that had fofeited, to be condemned by Cato. But therby Cato procured him felfe the displeasure of the other Senators, for that he feemed therein to take apon him the power and authoritie ouer the whole court, and election. For there is no vertue, whereof the honor and credit doth procure more enuy, then The power inflice doth: bicause the people doe commonly respect and reuerence that, more then any of inflice. other. For they doe not honor them as they doe valliant men, nor have them in admiration, as they do wife men: but they loue and trust them better. CATO VTICAN. 835 full and malicious defaut, and therefore can not be excused. Loe this was the cause why all A the noble men in manner were against Cato, as though he only had ouercome them. Powper he thought that the estimacion of Cate was altogether the discountenaunce of his power and greatnesse, and therefore did dayly raise vp many railers against him. Of them Fublius Clodin that seditious Tribune, who was againe fallen in frendship with Pompey: he accused Cato, and cried out vpon him, how he had robbed the common wealth of a wonderfull treasure, by his commission in Cypros: and that he was enemy vnto Pompey, bicause he did refuse to marry his daughter. Cato thereto made aunswas, that he had brought more golde and filuer out of CYPRVS, into the treasure of Rome, without the allowance of either horse or fouldier: then Pomper had done with all his triumphes and warres, with the which he had troubled all the world. And moreouer, that he did neuer feeke alliance with Pompey, not that he thought him R vnworthie of it, but bicause he saw he delt not as vprightly in the common wealth as he him felfe did. I, fayd he, haue refused a prouince offred me when I came out of my Prætorshipper but Pompey hath taken some by force, and geuen away vnto others. And to conclude, he lent

Cafar not long fince, an armie of fix thow fand men to ferue him in the warres in GAVLE; the which he neuer required of vs, nor Rompey graunted them him by our confent. But we fee. that so many armies, armors and weapon, so many men and horses, by common pleasures of our private citizens, geuen and lent at our charge. And Pompey him felfe referuing onely the name of Emperour, and Lieutenaunt generall, affigneth ouer his armies and prouinces to the gouernment of others, whilest he him selfe besiegeth here the walls of the citie, with seditious & tumultuous election of officers, craftily vnderminding therby the state of the com- C mon wealth, to bring all to confusion, that he him selfe might be absolute Prince, and rule alone. Thus was he reuenged of Pompey. Among Catoes frends, he had one called Marcus Faonius, fuch a one as Apollodorus Phalerian was fayd to be in old time, vnto Socrates, who did counterfeate to be an other him felfe, in doing all thinges as he did. This man would be farre out of reason, and passionate in his talke, storming like a dronkard. He one yere made sute to be Ædilis, but he was reiected. Howbeit Cato that furthered his fute, marked, that the tables wherein the voyces were wrytten, were all one hande. So, he finding out the falsehoode, appealed thereuppon vnto the Tribunes, and made the election voyde for that time. After that Case doth fer Faonius was created Ædilis, Cato did helpe him forth in all the other charges of his office, and specially in setting foorth playes in the Theaten which are customably done at the comming D in of euery such new officer, to geue the people pastime: and gaue vnto the common players and dauncers in those playes, no golden crownes, as other Ædiles did, but crownes of wilde oliue twigges, as they commonly vse in GR & CR at the Olympian games. And where others gaue vnto the poore rich gifts, he gaue the GRECTANS leekes, lettifes, radishes, and peares: and vnto the Romanes, they had earthen pottes full of wine, porke, figges, cowcombres, and fagots of wodde of small value. Insomuch as some thought scorne of the they were so meane, others were verieglad of them, seeing that Cato which was seuere and hard of nature, had a doing in them, and by litle and litle they turned this aufteritie of his into pleafure. In fine, Faonius him selfe fitting downe amongest the people, which looked apon the players, clapped his hands for ioy at Cato: and cried out to him, that he should geue them good rewardes that E played well, alluring them also about him to doe the like, and told them that he had made Cato the whole ruler of thoses sportes. At the selfe same time, Curio, Faonius colleague and companion in the office of Ædilis, had likewise goodly playes in an other Theater: but all the people for fooke his, and went to fee Faonius playes, who fate among them like a private man, and Cato as the maister of the playes. Cato did this in scorne and mockerie, of vaine charge and expences, which men are wont to bestow in such trisles, shewing thereby, that who so ener will make any playes, he should make the charge but a sport also furnishing it only with a connenient grace, but with no vaine expence or charge about such a trifle. Shortly after, when Scipio, Hypseu and Milo, fued all three together to be Confuls, not only by briberie of money (2 common fault then in fuing for any of the offices in the common wealth) but by plaine force F of armes, flaying and killing as in a ciuill warre, they were so desperat and insolent: some preferred a lawe, that they should make Pompey President in these elections, bicause men should

A moue their fute after a lawfull forte. But Cato straight was against it, saying, that the law could have no fafety by Pompey, but Pompey might have fafety by the lawe. Notwithflanding, when he fawe this trouble continewe of a long time, without any Confuls in Ro uz, and that dayly there were three campes in the market place, that it was almost impossible to present the mischiese at hand, and to stay that it should goe no further: then he thought it better, that the Senate of their owne good willes, rather then by compulsion, should put the government of the state into Pompess hands alone, choosing the lesser enill, to withstand the greater, and so to veeld to the absolute gouernment, without constraint, which the sedition would bring it vnno. Therefore Bibulus Catoes frend & kinseman, made a motion to the Senate, that they would choose Pompey sole Consul. For, sayd he, either the common wealth shall be well gouerned by R him, or else Rome shall serue an ill Lord. Cato then rising up, beyonde all mens expectacion confirmed Bibulus opinion, and fayd: that the citie were better to have one four raine Magifirate then none, and that he hoped Pompey could gene present order for the pacifying of this confusion, and that he would be carefull to preserve the citie, when he sawe that they trusted him with the gouernment thereof. Thus was Pompey by Catoes meanes chosen fole Confull. Pomper was Then he fent for Cato to come to his gardens to him, which were in the suburbes of the citie. treated fole Cato went thither, and was received with as great honor & curtefie of Pampey, as could be de- Catoes foruiled : and in thend, after he had geuen him great thankes for the honors he had done him, he tenet praved him to afford him his adulfe and counfell in his gouernment. Cato answered him thus, that he had not spoken any thing before that time in respect of any ill will he bare him; nei-

C ther that he delivered this last opinion of his in respect of his frendshippe, but wholly for the common wealthes fake: howbeit otherwise, that for his owne private affaires, if he thought good to vie his aduile, whenfoeuer it pleased him to aske his opinion, he would tell him the best he could. But for common causes, that he would alwayes tell what he thought, though he neuer asked him : and in fine, he performed all he fayd. For first of all, when Fomper did fee grieuous penalties & new fines apon their heades, which had bought the peoples voyces for money: Cato counselled him to prouide for thinges to come, and to let that alone which was already past. For fayd he, it is a hard thing to determine any certaine time, in the which a man should seeke to reforme the faults that are past; and furthermore, if the punishments appointed were newer then the offences committed, then they shoulde doe wrong vnto them that D were already accused to punish them by a new law which they had not offended. Afterwards allo, certaine men of good calling (Pompeis frends) being accused, Gare perceiving that Pompey grew remisse, and yeelded in many things the sharply reproved, and reformed him. Furthermore, where Pompey had by law taken away the praises which were wont to be spoken of the offenders that were accused: he him selfe norwithstanding having wrytten an oration in the praise of Munatius Planeus, sent it vnto the Ludges, whilest his cause was a bearing. Out being one of the Iudges at that time, stopped his eares with both his hands, and would not have it red. Wherefore Planeus refused him for one of his Judges, after his cause was pleaded vnto: howebeit he was condemned notwithstanding. To conclude Cato was such a griefe and trouble vnto them that were accused, that they coulde not rell well have to deale with him.

E For, once they durft not lette him be any of their Iudges, neither could they well also refuse any across him. For there were many that were condemned, which refusing Cato, seemed ynto where that they were giltie: & many also were shamefully reproudd, bicanse they would not accept Cato for their Iudge, when he was offered them. Thinges proceeding in this forefat & gots, Cafar remained in GAVLE with his armie, where he made warres : neverthelette heiwanne him frends still in Rome, by gifts and money, and made him selfe very strong. New appeared Catoes predictions and forewarnings true vnto Pompey, and began to quicken his spirits which had flept folong, and made him then to confider of the daunger, the which before he could not be perswaded to beleue. But perceiving his slackenes and seare withall douting howers proceede: to preuent Cafars practifes, Cato determined to fue to be Conful, with intere either cato fied to

F to make him leave his army, or elfe to finde out the practife he entended. Cather competitors, be conful, to they were both of the very honest men also, of the which, Sulpitius had received great honor reffice for. & preferrement by Catoes credit and authorities in respect whereof, many thought that it was scant honeftly done of Sulpitims, to shew himselfe so vnthankfull, as to stand against Cato in this A fure. Howbeit Cate neuer complained of the matter, but fayd, that it was no maruell he would geue place to no man in that, fith it was the greatest good happe that euer came vnto him. This notwithstanding he perswaded the Senate to make a law, that from thence forth, such as fued for any office, they should them selves be suters to the people, and not preferre their sute by others. This caused the people to be more offended with him, then before, bicause there by he did not only take away their fingering of money, which they got by their voyces in elections: but tooke from them the meanes they had also to pleasure many, bringing them now into pouertie and contempt. He therefore having no face to flatter the people and to currie fauor with them, but rather flicking to his graue maner and modest life, then to feeke the di-frends to take the ordinary course which might win the peoples harts, whereupon he was pur from his Confulshippe. This denyall was wont not only to have made the parties refused, ve. ry forowfull, but their frendes and kinfemen also greatly ashamed a long time after. Howbeit Cate made no reckoning of that, but went the next morning, and played at tennis with his frends in the field of Mars, and after he had dyned, walked againe in the market place, as his maner was, without shooes on his feete, and coate. But Cisero blamed him much for that his cause the common wealth requiring then such a Consul as he, he had not carefully endeugred him felfe by curtefie and gentle meanes to winne the fauor of the people, neither woulde euer after make sute for it, although at an other time he sued to be Prætor. Thereunto Cato

Furthermore Cafar making warre with very flowt nations, & hauing with no fmall daunger & trauell fubdued them: and hauing also set vpon the GERMAINES, with whom the ROMANES were at peace, and also slaine three hudred thowfand persons his frends made sute that the people should do solemne facrifice to geue thankes vnto the gods. But Cato in open Senate was of opinion, that they should deliver nion against Cefar into their handes, whome he had injured, to receive fuch punishment as they thought citie might be no partaker of it, fith they could not do withall. Neuertheleffe, fayd he, we are to doe facrifices vnto the goddes, to geue them thankes, for that they turned not the revenge of the fury and rashnes of the Captaine, apon our poore souldiers which were in no fault, but haue pardoned the common wealth. Cafar being advertised thereof, wrote a letter vnto the Senare, contayning many acculations against Cato. The letter being red, Cato rose, not as a man put in a chafe with choller, nor pricked with enuie, but coldly and quietly (as if he had long before premeditated what he would fay) declared that the accusations which Casar heaped against him in his letters, were but pretie mockes and sleytes which he had gathered to-Cate inneverb gether to make the people mery withall, But on thother fide, when he beganne to vnrippe his against Casa, whole intents and practifes from the beginning, not as if he had bene his enemie, but rather a E confederate with him in his conspiracie, declaring that they were not the Germaines, nor the GAVIES, which they were to be affrayed of, but of him felfe, if they were wife: he thereupon fo offended the Senate, and made such sturre among them, that Casars frends repented them they had caused his letters to be red in the Senate, giving Cato thereby occasion justly to complaine of Cafar, & to alleage much good matter against him. At that time therefore there was nothing decreed in the Senate against Cafar, but this was fayed onely, that it were good reason to let him have a successor. Then Casars frendes made sute that Pompey shoulde put away his army, and refigne vp the prouinces he kept, or elfe that they should compell Cafar no more then him to doe it. Then Cato opened his mouth, and fayd, the thing was now come to passe, which he had ever told them of, and that Cafar came to oppresse the common wealth, F openly turning the armie against it, which deceitfully he had obtained of the same. All this prevailed not, neither could be thereby winneany thing of the Senate, bicause the people saA noted Cafar, and would alwayes have him great ? for the Senate did beleve all that he fayed. Cato Progr but for all that they feared the people. When newes was brought that Cefar had wonne the first premise. citie of ARIMINUM, and was comming on with his armie towardes Rome: then every man looked apon Cato, and the people and Pompey confessed, that he only from the beginning had found out the marke Cafar (hot at and had hit the white of his flie deuise. Then favd Cato vnto them, if you would have beleved me, my Lordes, and followed my counfell: you should not now have bene affrayd of one man alone, neither should you also have put your only hope in one man. Pompey auniwered thereunto, that Cato in deede had geffed more truely, howbeit that he also had delt more frendly. Thereupon Cato gaue counsell, that the Senate should re-ferre all vnto Pompeys order: for, fayd he, they that can doe great mischiefe, knowe also howe R to helpe it. Pompey perceiving that he had no army convenient about him to tary Cafars comming, and that the men also which he had, were but faint harted: he forsooke the citie. Cato being determined to goe with him, fent his younger sonne before vnto Munatius, which lave Care followers in the contrie of the BRYTIANS, and tooke his eldest some with him. Now, bicause he was to prouide a flay and gouernor of his house and daughters, he tooke Martia againe, which was left a widowe and verie riche, for that Hortenfine dying, made her his heire of all that he had. Therein Cafar vpbraydeth Cato much, reprouing his conetousnes to marry for goodes. For, casarprefayd he, if he had neede of a wife, why then did he before graunt her vnto an other? If he had weih Catoes no neede of a woman, why then did he take her afterwards againe? Vnlesse she were before a bayte vnto Hortensius, to keepe her whilest she was young, that he might have her againe C when the was riche. But against that, me thinkes it is sufficient to recite these verses of Enrivides:

Vnlikelyhoodes first I will disproue. For wwhy? wwhat man can say, That ever feare made Hercules to turne his face avvay?

For I take it to be all one, to reproue Hercules cowardlines, and Catoes couctousnes. But if his mariage be to be reproued, peraduenture it is in an other forte. For fo foone as he had maried Martia againe, he left his house and his daughters to her goutenment, and followed Pompey. But after that time, men reporte that he neuer polled his head, clipped his beard, nor ware any garland, but to his dying day, lamented, and bewailed in his hart, the miferie and calamitie of his contrie, whether they had victorie, or were ouercome. So having the province of case is fens D SICILE allotted to him, he went vnto Syracvsa. There vnderstanding that Alinius Pollio into Sicile.

was arrived at MESSINA, with men of warre from his enemies: Cato fent vnto him, to knowe wherefore he came thither. Pollio againe asked of him, who was the causer of all this warre. Againe, when Cato was advertised that Pompey had forfaken ITALIE, & that he lay in campe beyond the sea, by the citie of Dyrrachivm, then he sayd, he saw a maruelous great chaunge and incerteintie in the prouidence of the goddes: that when Pompey did all things beyond reafon, and out of course, he was inuincible: and now that he sought to preserve his contrie, he faw he lacked his former good happe. Nowe he knewe he was strong enough at that time, to drine Alinius Pollio out of Sicile if he would but bicause there came a greater aide vnto him. he would not plague that Iland, with the miserie of warre. wards Pompey. When he was come vnto him he did alwaies coulfel him to prolong the warre, hoping still of some treaty of peace: & would in no case they should come to fight any battell, where the weaker parte should of necessity be put to the sword, by the stronger. Therefore he cases lawes perswaded Pomper and the counsellers about him, to establishe certaine lawes to this effect. in Pompey. That they should facke no citie in this warre, the which belonged vnto the Empire of Rome: amy and also, that they should kill no citizen of Rome, but in furie of battell, when their swordes. were in their hands. Therby he wanne him felfe great honor, and brought many men to take Pompeys parte, by the lenity and clemency he vied vnto them that were taken. Thereupon Cato being fent into As 1 A, to aide them that had commission to presse shippes & men of warre, F he tooke his fifter Servilia with him, and the boy which Lucullus had by her : for all the time of her widowhoode, the had followed Cato, and thereby had worne out her ill name the had before, fith they faw the had fo willingly geuen her felfe to follow him in his flying, and contented her selse with his straight maner of life. This notwithstading. Cesar did not let to shame her to Cato. Pompeys Captaines had no neede of Cato any where, but at the Rhodes. For his wanne the people there with his curreous vsage & perswasion, leauing with them Servilia and her lite sonne, and went from thence to Pompey campe, who had leauied a great armie both by sea and land. There did Pompey most of all discouer his minde and intent. For first he ment to have geuen Cato the charge of the armie by sea, which were aboue flue hundred shippes of warre, besides an infinite number of soystes & pinases, & such small bottomes vncouered: but sodainly cossessing better of its or possibly being informed by some of his frends, that al Catoer regard & counsell in matters of government was, to deliver Rome from tyranny, & that is he had so great a charge vnder him, Cesar being once overcome, he would also force Pompey to leave his army, & so make him sibiest to the law) he chaunged his minde, nowithstanding he Rome is minde, now the state of the same from the law he chaunged his minde, now that shall be the law he chaunged his minde, now with thanding he Rome.

had already moued it to Cato, & leaving him, gave Bibulus the charge of all his army by fea. But Cato therefore shewed no lesse good will vnto Pompey, then before. For it is reported, that in a certaine skirmilh & coffict before the city of DYRRACHIVM, Pompey encoraging his fouldiers. & commaunding euery Captaine also to do the like in his quarter: the souldiers gaue but faint eare vnto them, & made no manner of show of men whose harts had bene any whit the more encoraged thereby. But when Cato after them all came and told them (as the time ferued) the reason of Philosophie, and the effect of libertie, manhoode, death, and honor, and that with a great vehement affection: and last of all ending his oration, calling apon the gods, turning his speache vnto them, as if they had bene present to have seene how valliantly the souldiers fought for the libertie of their contry: they gaue such a lustie crye, and had such a braue conceite & vehement desire to fight like men, that all the Captaines were filled with good hope. and so led them to battell, where they gaue such a cruell charge and sierce onser apon their enemies, that they ouerthrewe them, and put them that day to flight. Howebeit Cafars good fortune tooke the finall ende of this victorie from Pompey, by his ouergreat feare and miltrust who could not tell how to take the benefit of his victorie, as we have wrytten more amply in his life. But when all the rest reioyced that they had done so noble an exployte, & made their vawnts of the great advantage they had of their enemies: Cato to the contrarie bewailed the calamitie of his contrie, and lamented that curfed ambicion which caufed fo many good and valliant citizens of one felfe citie, so to kill and murther one an other. After this overthrowe, Cafar taking his way into THESSALIE, Pompey raised his campeto followe him, and leaving a D great power at Dyrrachivm, of men, armor, munition and frends: he gaue Cato the charge of them all, and fifteene enlignes of footemen belides. The which he did for the feare and miftrust he had of him, being affured, that if by ill fortune he should lose the battell, he knew well enough that he could not committhem to a truftier man then he : but on thother fide if he wanne the victory, he douted fore that he could not command as he would, where Cato was, pp (si cas a Dyrac chims.

CHIVM, with Cato. In fine, the ouerthrow of the battell at Pharsalia being blowen abroad, Cato resoluted with himselfe if Pompey were dead, that he would passe ouer all his men into I TALIS, and then like a banished man would him selfe alone wander as farre as he coulde from the syrannie: and contrarily, if he were aliue, that then he would keepe his army together for him.

rannie: and contrarily, if he were aliue, that then he would keepe his army together for him, B as long as he could. With this determination, he passed ouer the sea into the sle of Corry, where Pompeys armie by sea lay. There Cato sinding Cuero, he would have surrendered up his charge unto him, as to a man of greater dignitie, for that he had bene Consul, and Cato only but Prator. Howbeit Cicero would in no wise receive it, but returned immediately into I talt.

Cato then perceiving that Pompey the youngers (some unto Pompey the great) of a rash & hawty minde, would have punished all them that went into I talts, and left the armie by sea, and that specially he was bent first of all to begin with Cicero: Cato reproved him privately for it, so that he certainly saved Ciceroes life, and many other moe besides. Now Cato supposing that Pompey the great had saved him selfe in Ab y pry, or in A pricks, he determined to take the seas, to meete him with all his men: but before he tooke shippe, he gave all men leave to degree that twee not willing to follow him. Cato being arrived in A pricks. Sayling up & downer the coast there, he met with Sextus, the youngest some of Pompey, who first told him, that his

A father was flaine in ÆGYPT: when the fouldiers heard it, they tooke it very heavely, and not one of them after the death of Fompey the great, would ferue under any other Captaine then Cato. He therupon being ashamed, & thinking it pity also to leave so many noble & good men that had ferued fo faithfully under him, without a Captaine, not knowing what way to take, nor whether to goe: at their request he was contented to take charge of them, and went first unto the citie of Cyrenes, where not many dayes before, the citizens had thut the gates against Labienus. Being there, it was told him that Scipio, Pompeys father in law, was gotten vnto king Juba, who had received him: and that Affius Varus, vnto whome Pomper had geven the charge of the prouince of A. F. R. I.C. K.E., was in their company with an army, and determined to goe joyne with them. So he went by lande in the winter time, and had gotten a maruelous n number of affes together, to cary water and vittels, which followed him with a great number of carts belides, and of those men, which the A FRICANES Call PSILLES, to wit, they that doe Pfiles, be heale the stinging of serpents, and doe sucke out the poyson with their mouthes, and doe furthermore charme and enchaunt the fnakes, that they have no power to doe any hurt. The affaires on their side had but hard successe, for the contencion and variance to be the west Scipio, and Varus, for the which, they both stattered king subst to winne his fauor: being a maruelous prowde man for his greatnes and riches: as he shewed the first time he spake with Caso. For when Caso came, he caused his owne chayre to be set betwext Scipio and Caso. The modessis to haue the honor to be in the middest. But Caso perceiving it, tooke vp his owne chaire, and mobile to have the honor to be in the middest. Thus Caso did pull downe the pride of the king at that time, who before had vsed Scipio, and Varus, as his noble men and subjects: howeveir Caso did reconcile them together againe. Furthermore, when all the companie D prayed him to take charge of the whole armie, and that Scipio him selfe, and Parus both, did preserve the authoritie and priviledge thereof, neither would take vpon him to commainde all, him selfe being but Viceprator, where there was a Viceconfull present. For setpio was Canioponth created Proconfull, and furthermore, the people had a certayne confidence that their affaires with Schio woulde prosper the better, if they had but the name of a Scipio to leade them in AFRICKES.

Nowe when Scipio was Generall ouer them, he woulde straight, for Inbaes sake, haue put all

Afterwards, partly at the request of the people, and partly also at Scipiose can was inflance, Cato tooke apon him to keepe the city, fearing least by treason; or against their wills, sinde Gomeristhould come into Casars hands: bicause it was a strong place of scituacion, and well replenias of visica.

But Scipio was fo flowt, that he regarded not Catoes coufell, but wrote otherwhile vn. to him, twitting him with his cowardlines in this maner: that it was enough for him to be fafe in a good city compassed about with walls, though otherwise he sought not to hinder men to be valliant, to execute any enterprise as occasion was offred. Cato wrote againe vnto him, that he was ready to goe into IT ALIE with his footemen and horsemen which he had brought into Africke to draw Calar from them, and to turne him against him. Scipio made but a spore arit. Then Cato shewed plainly, that he did repent him he had geuen him the preferrement to be generall of the army, bicause he saw he would but fondly prosecute this warre: & also, that if he chaunced to ouercome, he could not moderately vie the victory against his contry men, Then he beganne to mistrust the good successe of this warre (and so he told his frendes) for the Generall's hastines and vnskilfulnesse: and yet if beyonde expectacion it fell out well, and that Cafar were overthrowen, he would never dwell at Rome any more, but would flye the crueltie and bitternes of Scipio, who even at that prefent time did prowdly threaten many. But in the ende, that fell out sooner then looked for. For a poste came to him late that night who but three dayes before departed from the campe, and brought newes that all was loft. in a great battell, by the citie of Thapses, which Cafar had wonne: that he had taken both campes, that Sespio and king Iuba were fled with a fewe men, and that all the rest of their armie was flaine. These newes did put the citizens in such a seare and maze, (and specially being in the warre, and in the night time) that for very feare they could feant keepe them selues within o the walles of their citie. But Cato meeting with them, stayed them that ranne vp and downe crying in the streetes, and did comfort them the best he could. Yet he tooke not all their seare from them, though he brought them againe vnto them selues from the extasse they were in declaring ynto them, that the losse was nothing so great as it was made, and that it was a common matter to enlarge fuche newes with wordes enowe. By these perswasions, he somwhat pacified the tumult and vprore, and the next morning by breake of day, he made proclamacion, that the three hundred men which he had chosen for his counsellers, should come and affemble in the temple of Impiter, they all being citizens of Rome, which for trafficke of marchaundife lay in A FRICKE, and all the ROMANE Senators and their children also. Nowe whilest they gathered them selues together, Cato him selse went verie grauely with a set mo- n dest countenaunce, as if no suche matter had happened, having a little booke in his hande, which he read as he went. This booke conteyned the store and preparacion of municion he had made for this warre, as corne, armor, weapons, bowes, flings and footemen. When they Catoes or asion were all affembled, he began greatly to commend the good love and faithfulnes of these three Timo the Ro- hundred ROMANES, which had profitably ferued their contry with their persons, money, and counsell, and did counsell them not to depart one from an other, as men having no hope, or , otherwise seeking to faue them selves scatteringly. For remeining together, Casar would lesse " despise them, if they would make warre against him : and would also sooner pardon them, if " they craued mercie of him. Therefore he counfelled them to determine what they would do. " and for his owne parte, he fayed he would not mislike whatsoeuer they determined of : for if " their mindes followed their fortune, he would thinke this chaunge to proceede of the necesfitie of time. But if they were resolued to withstande their missortune, and to hazard them felues to defend their libertie:he then would not only commend them, but having their noble ,, corage in admiration, would him selfebe their chieftaine and companion, euen to proue the " fortune of their contrie to the vttermost. The which was not VTICA, nor ADRVMETVM, but " the citie selfe of Rome: the which oftentimes through her greatnes, hadraifed her selfe from " greater davingers and calamities. Furthermore, that they had many waies to faue them felues. " & the greatest meane of all was this that they should make warre with a man, who by reason " of his warres was compelled to be in many places. For Spayne of the one fide was vp against him; and tooke parte with the younger Pompey: and the citie of Roma also not being yied to

And contrarily also, that vnto them, the incertaintie of the warre, if victorie followed, would " make them happy: as also in being ouerthrowen, their death would turne to immortall glory. Notwithstanding, they were to thinke of the matter among theselues, & to make their praiers to the gods, that in recopence of their vertue & good service which they had shewed thitherunto they would graff the grace to determine for the best. After Cate had ended his oration. there were divers of the that were stirred up by his lively perswasions, but the most part of the were incoraged by his constancy & noble minde, & also by his kindnes : so that they presently forgate the daunger they were in & prayd him to comaund their persons, goods, & weapons, as he thought good, taking him for their only inuincible Captaine, of whom fortune had no R power, thinking it better to dye obeying his counfell, then to faue them felues, for faking fo valliant and worthy a man. Then, when one of the affembly made a motion that they shoulde make their bondmen free, & that divers also did confirme it. Cato fayd he would by no meanes The equity of fuffer it, because it was neither meete nor lawfull: howbeit if their maisters would manumise Caso. them, that he was cotented to receive the for fouldiers, that could weare any weapon. Divers promifed him to do it: & Cato commaunded their names should be enrolled that would, & so went his way. Immediatly after, letters were brought him fro king Iuba, & Scipio: of the which, king Iuba was hidden in a moutaine with few men with him, who fent vnto him to know what he would determine to do. For if he ment to forfake V TICA, he would tary him there: & if otherwise he determined to kepe VTICA, then that he would come & helpe him with an army. Scipio on thother fide riding at ancker, at a point of the land not farre from VTICA, staid for the like aunswere. Then Cato thought it best to stay the messengers which had brought him their letters, till he faw what was the determination of the three hundred. For all they that were Senators of ROME, were verie glad men, & did presently make their bondmen free, & gaue them weapons. But the other three hundred which were marchant venterers, & that lived by viury Cato forfaken & exchange, who had the most parte of their goods in slaves & bondmen, did not long fol- ared Romane low Catoes counfell: but like men, whose bodies soone receiue heate, & are soone cold againe, marchau at when they are once gone from the fire: euen fo those marchats, while Cato was present among them, had forme good prety will & defire: but when by them felues they had caft their accopt. the feare they had of Cafar, made them forget the reuerence they bare vnto Cato, 8cvnto their duety. For, fayd they, what are we, & what is he whom we disdaine to obey? Is it not Gefar him felfe, who at this day is Lord & Emperor of Rome? Neuer a one of vs is Scipio, Pomper, nor Cato: & yet now, when all men for feare (& in maner compelled) do yeld & fubmit the felues, we will nedes take voon vs within the wals of V TICA to fight for the liberty of ROME against him! for whom, Cate flying with Pompey, for fooke I TALIE: and we now make our bondmen free to fight with Cafar, having no better liberty our felues, then it pleafeth him to gene vs. Let vs therefore now know our felues whileft we have time. & crave mercie at his handes that is the stronger, & send ynto him, to pray him to pardon vs. The greatest & wisest men of those three hundred marchants, had this speache. But the most parte of them sought meanes how to entrappe the Senators, hoping the better of mercy at Cafars hand, if they did deliuer them vnto him, Cate did looke for this chaunge in them, but yet verered not that he thought & returned the messengers backe againe vnto king Iuba, and Scipio, and wrote vnto them: that they should beware they came not neere V TICA, bicause he did mistrust these three hundred marchants. Now there were a great number of horsemen which had escaped from the battell, who comming towards V TICA, fent three of their company vnto Cato, the which brought him not one felfe determination from all the company. For some of them went to go vnto king Iuba, others also to joyne with Cato, & parte of them were affraid to come into V ric A. These things being thus reported vnto Cato, he commaunded Mareus Rubrius to take care of these three hundred men, & to receive the names of the bondmen which they willingly manumifed, without compelling of any man. In the meane time, Cato with all the Senators went out of V TICA to meete with these horsemen, & there he spake to the Captaines, & praidthem that they would not for- caner pinie fake fo many noblemen & Senators of Rome as werethere: & that they would not have king and regard the citie was of fuche strength, and besides, so well armed and vitteled for many yeres. The like A request did the Senators also make vnto them, with the teares running downe their cheekes. Thereupon the Captaines went & spake with their souldiers. Cato in the meane time fate him downe on a litle hill, with the Senators, tarying for aunswere. But then on the sodaine came Rubrius vnto him in great haft, complaining of the tumult of these three hundred marchants. which went about to make the city to rebell: whereupon, the rest their harts failing them fell to bewaile their miserable fortune. But Cato sought to comfort them, and then sent vnto the three hundred marchantes, to pray them to have a litle pacience. So the Captaines returned againe with vnreasonable demaundes of the horsemen. For they sayd, that they cared not for king Jubaes pay, neither were they affrayed of Cafars malice, so that they had Cato for their generall: ver to be pende vp within the walls of a citie with AFRICANES, that were PHOENICE R ANS, and a traiterous nation as could be: that grieued them most of all. For, sayd they, though now they sturre not, and be quiet: yet when Cafar comes, they will be the first that will betray vs. and cut our throates. And therefore, if Cato woulde have them to ioyne with him in this warre: that he should either kill or drive away all the VTICANS out of the citie, and then that they would come into it, when it was cleere of all those barbarous people their enemies. Cate thought this a cruell and barbarous condicion, neuertheles he told them that he would talke with the three hundred: and so returning agains into VTICA, he spake vnto them. But they then not regarding the reuerece vnto Cato, diffembling no lenger, faid openly, that they would not like of him whatfoeuer he were, that should compel them to make warre with Cafar, both bicause they would not, nor could not doe it. Further, there were some of them that mumbled o to them selves, that the Senators should be kept there, till Casar came. Cato overheard them. for in deede his hearing was not very quicke. At that very instant one came to him, and tolde him, that the horsemen were going their way. Cato therefore fearing least these three hundred marchants would lay hands apon the Senators: he went vnto them him felfe with his frends, and perceiving they were gone a great way of, he tooke his horse and rode after them. They rejoycing to fee him come, received him among them, and prayed him to faue him felfe with them. But Cato prayed them againe to faue the Senators, & that with fuch affection, as it forced teares in him, besides, he held up his hands unto them, tooke their horses by the bridles.& them felues by their weapons, that at length he obtained of them, that they woulde remaine there one daye at the least, to helpe the Senators to saue them selues. So Cato returning with D them into the city, he appointed some of them to ward at the gates, & put others also in garrison into the castell: so that the three hudred marchants quaked for feare, least he would have bene reuenged of them, bicause of their returne with him. Thereuppon they sent vnto Cato, humbly to praye him to come vnto them in any case. But the Senators flocking about him, would not fuffer him to go, & faid, that they would not cast away their fauior and protector, to The fincerine put him into traitors hands. Then doutles, all that were within VTICA, plainly faw the vertue & fimplicity of Cato, and found that there was no frawde nor deceite in him: who having long time resolved to kill him selfe, he only tooke that extreame paines & care for others that their liues being faued, he might then rid him felfe of his owne. For men might eafely fee, though he diffembled it, that he was refolued to dye. Whereupon, having comforted the Senators, he E veelded vnto the requests of the three hundred marchants, & went him selfe alone vnto them. Then they thanked him much for his coming, and prayed him to commaund them, & boldly to trust them: so that he would pardon them if they could not be all Catoes, and would take pity of their faint harts, though they were not fo constant & noble minded as he. For they were determined to fend vnto Cafar, specially to intreate him for him: and if that they could not obteine pardon for him, then they were affured they could have none for them felues, and therfore would fight for the fafety of him, while they had any breath in their bodies. Cato thanking them for their good wills, answered: that they should fend quickely to craue pardon for them felues, but to aske none for him. For fayd he, men that be ouercome, & haue offended, it ftandeth them upon to make humble fute, and to craue pardon: but for him selfe, he was neuer o- F uercome in his life, and yet had ouercome as much as he defired, and had alwayes bene better then C.efar in iustice, who only (not him selfe) was now taken and ouercome: the thing being

A apparantly proved in fight against him, which he had alwaies denied to have practifed against his contry. When he had made this answere vnto the three hundred marchants, he departed from them. Newes being brought that Casar was in his way with all his armie, comming towards VTICA: O goddes, fayd he, then he commeth against vs, as against men. Then turning vnto the Senators, he gaue them counfell quickely to faue them felues, whileft the horfemen were yet in the city. So shutting all the gates of the city, saying that towards the hauen; he appointed shippes for them all, and fet euery thing at a stay, without tumult or disorder, no man having injurie offered him, and gaue eneric one money to make way for their fafetie. When Marcus Oftauius (who came with two legions, and camped hard by VTICA) fent vnto Cato, to determine which of them two should be Generall: he made no aunswere, but turning to his o frends faid: How can we wonder any more that all goeth to wracke with vs. fith there is fuche ambition amongst vs for the gouernmet, even now, when we are at the last cast? In the meane Catorepresent time word was brought him, how the horsemen going their way were spoyling of the citizens of men. goods, as a lawfull pray in warre. He straight ran thither him selfe, and the first he met withall, he tooke from them that they had gotten. The rest, before he came vnto them, threw downe that they were carying away, & hanging downe their heades for shame, they went their way. and faid nothing. Then Cato calling all the citizens of VTICA together, prayed them not to incense nor moue Casar against the three hundred but rather to craue of him pardon for the all. Then he went againe to the peere, and there imbracing his frends, & taking his leaue of them all, he brought them to their shippes. Now for his sonne, he did not cousell him to go, neither o did he thinke it mete to vrge him to forfake his father. Furthermore, there was one Statilius a Statilius, a young man in his companie, of a noble corage, that was determined to follow the inuincible follower of constancy of Cato: who counfelled him to take the sea, and to faile away with the rest, bicause he knew he was Cafars mortall enemy. Statistus faid he would not go. Then Cato turning him ynto Apollonides a Stoick Philosopher, & vnto Demetrius a Peripatetick Philosopher, faid: you must take this stowt young man to perswade him to obey vnto necessity. Cato him selfe in the meane time fent away the rest; & did minister instice vnto them that required it : spending all that night, & the next day, about those matters. Then Lucius Casar, the kinseman of Iulius Cafar the conqueror being chosen by the three hundred to goe & make fute vnto him for them all, came and prayed Cato to help him to make his oration, which he should say vnto Casar for D them all: and as for thee, Cato, faid he, I will kille his hands, and fall downe on my knees before him to intreate him for thee. Nay faid Cato, thou shalt not do so. For if I would faue my life by Cato would Cafars grace, I could do it, if I would but go vnto him : howbeit I will not be bound to a tyran down begged of for injustice. For it is an injustice in him to take vpo him, as a Lord & source to sauce mans cafer for life, when him felfe hath no authority to commaund. But yet let vs confider if thou wilt, what him thou shalt fay, to craue pardon for the three hundred. So they were a while together consideting the matter, and in fine, Lucius Cafar being ready to departe, Cato recommended his fonne and frendes vnto him, and imbracing him, tooke his leave of him. Then he returned vnto his lodging, and calling his fonne and frends before him, and talking of many matters: among others he charged his some in no case to meddle in thaffaires of the common wealth. For said case forbad E he, to deale vprightly like Catoes fonne, the corruption of the time and state will not abide it: his forme to and contrarily observing the time, thou canst not do like an honest man. Towards evening he matter of went into his bath to washe him selfe, and as he was a bathing, thinking apon Statelline, he cried State in a out alow de : well Apollonides, thou hast at length yet perswaded Statilius, to goe his way and corrupt sime. pulled downe his flowt courage he had: and is he gone without bidding vs farewell a Howe, gone fayd Apollonides? Nay, his hart is now more flowt and couragious then euer it was, not withstanding all the perswations we could vie vnto him: for he is determined to tary & to take fuch part as thou doeft. After he had bathed him felfe, he went to supper & fare at his meater. as he had alwaies yied after the battell at Pharfalia, and neuer lay, but when he went to bed. So he had all his frends, & the chiefe Magistrats of VTICA to supper with him, After supper, they

But Cato was very earnest against the Peripateticke, and argued the matter a long time, with a A vehement speach and contencion: insomuch as they that heard him, found then that he was determined to ende his life, & to rid him him felfe out of all those troubles. But then when he had ended his argument, and fawe that enery man helde his peace, and looked fadly of it: to comfort them againe, and to put the suspicion of his death out of their heades: he beganne againe to fall in talke of their affaires, and seemed to be carefull of them, as though he had bene affrayed least some missortune were come vnto them apon the sea, or vnto them that were gone by land, bicause they passed through desertes, where there was no water to be had Now when supper was done, and the straungers gone, he walked as his manner was with his frends, and having taken order with the Captaines of the watch for matters of service. as the time required: going into his chamber he embraced his fonne and his frendes more louingly a then he was wont to doe, whereby he made them againe suspect the execution of his determination. When he was come into his chamber and layed in his bedde, he tooke Platoes dia-Platoes dialogues in his hand, treating of the foule, and red the most parte of it. Then looking by his beds fide, and miffing his fword (which his fonne had taken from him when he was at fupper) he called one of the groomes of his chamber to him, and asked him who had taken his fword away : his man made him no aunswere, & he fell againe to read his booke. Then a prety while after, not feeming to be importunate, or ouerhaftie of the matter, but as though he woulde only know what became of it: he willed the to bring him his fword againe. They taried long. and he had red ouer all the booke, but yet his fword was not brought him againe. Wherupon he called for all his men one after an other, & very angrily asked them his fword, & gaue one C of them such a blow in the face, that his nose fell a bleeding, & his hand was all bloody withal. and cried out that his sonne and his servaunts would deliver him naked into the hands of his enemie: vntill his sonne and frends at length ranne vnto him, & falling downe on their knees. lamented, and befought him to be contented. Cato then ruling out of his bedde, looked grimly youn them, and fayd vnto them : O goddes, who euer faw me in this taking? Why doth no man by reason perswade me, if they see me out of the way: & not to kepe me from my determination by plucking my weapons from me? why doeft thou not bind thy father (my fonne) his hands behinde him, that when Cafar commeth, he may finde me in cafe not to defend my felfe > I doe not defire my fworde to hurte my felfe, for if I had any fuche minde, I neede but hold my breath a litle, or geue but a knocke of my head against the wall onely, and dispatche n my felfe quickely. When he had fayd thus, his fonne went out of his chamber weeping, and all his frends also, no man remayning with Cato, but Demetrius and Apollonides, vnto whom he spake more gently, and reasoned in this sorte. What, doe you thinke to keepe an old man as I am aliue by force? And have you taried behinde but to fit staring apon me, and say nothing vnto me? If otherwise else, by reason you come to perswade me, that it shall be no shame for Cato, dispairing of the safetie of his life, to seeke it by the grace and mercy of his enemy : why then doe you not now tell me your reasons to perswade me, that forsaking all other fancies & determinatios which hetherunto we have holden for good, being on a fodaine become wifer by Cafars meanes, we should be bound the more therefore to gene him thankes? I do not tell you this that I have determined any thing of my life, but that it is in my power (if I lift) to put E the thing in execution I have determined : but yet I will confult with you, when I am so determined, to heare the reasons and opinion of your bookes, which your selues doe vie in difcourse and argument together. Goe your way therefore hardily vnto my sonne, and tell him, that he must not thinke to compell his father vnto that, which he can not proue good vnto him by reason. After this talke, Demetrius and Apollonides being nothing comforted, weeping, departed out of his chamber. Then his sword was brought him by a little boy. When he had it, he drew it out, and looked whether the point and edge of his fword was sharpe and woulde cut: when he saw it was well, O, sayd he, now I am where I would be, and so laying downe the fword naked by him, he tooke his booke againe in his hand, and red it ouer (as they fav) twild killed him together. Then he flept fo foundly after it, that his men which were without his chamber # heard him fnort againe. About midnight, he called for two of his freemen, Cleanthes his PhiSohe fent him ynto the hauen to fee, if all his men that were imparked were under faile; and gave his hand vnto the Philitian to be bound vp, bicaufe it was fwollen with the blow he gave one of his flaues when he hit him on the face. All his feruaunts were glad to beare of that hoping then that he defired to line. Soone after came But as backe againe from the hauen, and brought him word that all were gone but Craffus, who flayed about forme busines he had, and ver that he was going to take shippe: howbeir that the sea was very roughe, and winde exceeding great, Cate hearing this, fighed, being fory for them that were apon the fearand lent But as hacke agains to the hauen, to fee if any man came backe for any matter they had to fay vnto him. The little birdes began to chirpe, and Catofel againe in a little flumber. But thereuppon Buten returned, & brought him word that all was quiet in the hauen, & there was no ffurre. Then B Cato bad him goe his way, and thut to the dore after him, and layed him downe in his bed, as though he had ment to haueflept out all the rest of the night. But as backe was no sooner turned, but Cato taking his naked fword in his hand, thrust it into his breast howbeit the swelling The death of of his hand made the blowe fo weake, that it killed him not presently, but drawing on to his latter ende, he fell downe voon his bedde, and made such a noyse with his fall souerthrowing alitle table of geometry hard by his bedde, that his feruaunts hearing the noyle, gaue a great threeke for feare. Thereuppon his sonne and his friendes ranne into the chamber, and found him all of a gore bloud, and the most part of his bowells comming out of his bodye, him selfe being yet alive, and feeing them. They were all striken with such forow to behold it that at the first they were so amased, as they could not tel what to say to it, His Phistia comming to him. Che went about to put in his bowels againe which were not perified, and to low up his wound. But Cate comming to him felfe, thrust backe the Phisitian, and tare his bowells with his owne handes, and made his wound very great, and immediatly gaue vp the ghoft. Whereuppon the three hundred Romans (in leffe time then a man would have thought Catoes owne houshold feruaunts could have knowen of his death) were at his dores, and immediatly after, all the people of V TIC A also came thither, and with one voyce called Caro their benefactor and sauior, and fayd he onely was a free man, and had an intincible minder and this was done, when they heard fay that Cafar was not farre from V rica. Furthermore, nether feare of the present daunger, nor the defire to flatter the Conqueror, nether any private quarrellamongest them selves, could keepe them from honoring Carges superalls. For sumpty outly setting out his bo- Casoes sume-D dy, and honorably accompanying his funeralls as unight be, they buryed him by the fea fide, ralls. where arthis prefent time is to be seene his image, holding a sworde in his hande. After that, they made their best way to saue them selues and their citie. Nowe Cafar beeing aduertised by them that came vnto him, howe Cate sturred not from V T to A, nor fled not but sent all others away fauing him felfe, and his sonne, and a few of his friends that remained there, being afraid of nothing; he could not deuise what he ment by it. Therefore effecting Cato much he made hafte with all the speede he could with his armie, to come thether . But when he vitdefstoode that Cato had flaine him felfe, writers doe reporte he fayd thus: O Gato, I entry thy death, fithe color faring thou hast enuied mine honor to fauethy life. For in deede, had Cato been contented contented and fhould have faued his life, he had not fo much impaired his owner honor, as he had avernen-B ted Cafars glory. And yet what Cafar would have done, men make it doubtful, fauing that they coniecture well of Cafars clemencie: Cato dyed when he was but eight and forty years old. For his some, Cafar neuer did him hurt: howbeit it is reported of him that he was per tidlely git The some of uen, and lascinions besides. For when he lay in CARPADOCIA, in a noble many liquite of the Cato what con kings bloud, called Maphradates, who had a fayre woman to his wife: he taffed longer there then he might well with honestie, whereupporche fell to be a laughing flor his olthe beople, and in mockery they fayd, Care will goe too morrow, a thirty dayes hence I And forther, that Maphradates and Porcius are two good friendes but they have but one minde And chemication was, bicause Maphradates wife was called Pficke, which in the Greeke significated minde : and Poche Signi Cato is a noble fellow, and hath a princely mind, howbeit his famous death dibble ope this int fieth mind I famous speech. For they having received great pleasures and friendships of the people, were ashamed to be indetted to them, and therefore earnestly sought to exceede the people in good will, by new decrees and denifes, which they preferred for common benefit: and the people also for their partes contended to honor them the more, by how much they strived to shewe them selues thankefull. So with like strife on either side, they to gratifie the common people, and the people also to honor them, were vnwares so entangled with publike causes, D that they could no more follow the common prouerbe, which fayth:

This thou shalt easily finde by the declaracion of the historie. With these we doe compare two other popular men, both kinges of LACED EMON, Agu and Cleomenes. For they, as the Gracchi, seeking to increase the power of the common people, and to restore the just and honest gouernment againe of the common wealth of LACED & MON, which of long time had bene out of vse: did in like manner purchase the hate of the nobilitie, which were loth to lose any part of their wonted couetousnes. In deed these two LACONIANS were no brethre borne, but yet did both follow one felfe course & forme of gouernment, which had beginning in this E fort. After that couetousnes of gold and silver crept againe into the citie of Sparta, and with riches, couetousnes also and miserie, and by vse, voluptuousnes and licentious life: Sparta then was void of all honor and goodnes, and was long time drowned in shame and dishonor, vntill king Agis and Leonidas came to raigne there . Agis was of the house of the Eurytiontides, the sonne of Eudamidas, the fixt of lineall descent after Agesilaus, who had beene the greatest Prince of all GRECE in his time. This Agestlans had a sonne slaine in ITALY by the MESSAPI-ANS, called Archidamus, before the citie of MANDONIVM. Archidamus had iffue two fonnes, Agu, and Eudamidas that was king, who fucceeded his brother Agu, whom Antipater flue before the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, and left no children behind him. This Areus dyed before the citie of Co. RINTHE : who having an other Acrotatus to his sonne, he succeeded him in the kingdome. She beeing brought to bedde after his death of a fonne, whome Leonidas the fonne of Cleonymus taught and brought vp: the childe dying very young, the crowne by his death was cast apon Leonidas him selfe. Howbeit his maners & conditions neuer liked the people. For though all men generally were corrupted through the comon wealth, and cleane out of order: yer Leonidas of all other exceeded, deforming most the auncient LACONIAN life, bicause he had bene long time brought vp in Princes houses, & followed also Selencus Court, from whence he had brought all the pride and pompe of those Courts into GR ECE, where law & reason ruleth. Agis on the contrary part did not onely farre excel Leonidas, in honor and magnanimitie of mind: but all other almost also which had raigned in Spanta, from the time of Agesilans the great. So that when Agis was not yet twenty yeare old, and being daintily brought vp with the finenes of two women, his mother Agelifrata, and Archidamia his grandmother, which had more gold and filuer, then all the LACED E- C MONIANS els: he began to spurne against these womanish delights & pleasures, in making him felfe fayer to be the better beliked, and to be fine and trimme in his apparell, and to cast vpon him a plaine spanish cape, taking pleasure in the dyet, bathes, and manner of the auncient La-CONIAN life: and openly boafted besides, that he would not desire to be king, but onely for the The first begin hope he had to restore the auncient LACONIAN life by his authority. Then began the state of LACED EMON first to be corrupted, and to leave her auncient discipline, when the LACED E-MONIANS having fubdued the Empire of the Athenians, stored them selves & contry both. with plenty of gold & filuer. But yet referuing still the lands left vnto them by succession from em difeipline. their fathers, according vnto Lyeurgus first ordinaunce & institucion, for division of the landes amongest them: which ordinaunce, and equalitie being inuiolably kept amongest them, did D vet preserue the common wealth from defamation of divers other notorious crimes. Vntil the time of the authoritie of Epitadeus, one of the Ephores, a feditious man, and of prowde condition of lander, tions: who bitterly falling out with his own sonne, preferred a law, that euery man might lawfully give his landes and goods whilest he lived, or after his death by testament, vnto any man prizateur law whom he liked or thought well of. Thus this man made this law to fatisfie his anger, & others also did confirme it for couetousnes sake, and so ouerthrew a noble ordinaunce. For the riche men then began to buy lands of numbers, and fo transferred it from the right & lawful heires. whereby a few men in short time being made very riche, immediatly after there fell out great pouertie in the citie of Sparta, which made all honest sciences to cease, & brought in thereuppon vnlawfull occupacions, who enuyed them that were wealthy. Therefore, there remayned not aboue seuen hundred naturall Citizens of Sparta in all, & of them, not aboue a hundred that had lands and inheritance: for all the reft were poore people in the citie, and were of no countenaunce nor calling, & befides that, went vnwillingly to the warres against their ene-Agis greeka- mies, looking euery day for sturre and chaunge in the citie. Agis therefore thinking it a notable good acte (as in deede it was) to replenish the citie of Spart againe, and to bringe in the old equalitie, he moued the matter vnto the Citizens. He found the youth (against all hope) to aunciei sfinte. giue good eare vnto him, and very well giuen vnto vertue, easily chaunging their garments & life, to recouer their libertie againe. But the oldest men, which were now even rotten with couetoulnes and corruption, they were affraid to returne againe to the straight ordinaunces of L; curqus, as a flaue and ronneagate from his Maister, that trembleth when he is brought back F againe vnto him. Therefore they reproued Agu, when he did lament before them their present miserable estate, and wishe also for the former auncient honor and true dignitie of SPARTA

A Howbeit Lyfander the sonne of Lybu, and Mandroclidas the sonne of Esphanes, and Agesilaus alfo, greatly commended his noble defire, and perswaded him to goe forward withall. This Infander was of great authoritie and estimation amongest them in the citie: Mandroclidas was also very wise, and carefull, about any matter of counsell, and with his wisedom and policv.very valiant: Agefilaus in like manner, the kings Vncle, and an eloquent man, was very effeminate and couctous, and yet prickt forward to give his furtherance to this attempt as it appeared, by his sonne Hippomedon, who was a notable good souldier, and could doe very much by meanes of the loue and good will the younge men did beare him . But in deede, the secret cause that brought Agesilaus to consent vnto this practise, was the greatnes of his dette which he ought, of the which he hoped to be discharged by chaunging of the state and common R wealth. Now when Agis had wonne him, he fought by his meanes to drawe his mother also unto the matter, which was Agefilaus fifter. She could doe very much by the number of her friendes, followers, and detters in the citie, by whose meanes she ruled the most part of the affavres of the citie after her owne pleasure. But the young man Hippomedon making her privie vinto it, at the first she was amased withall, and bad him hold his peace if he were wise, and not medle in matters vnpossible and vnprositable. But when Agesilaus had told her what a notable acte it would be, and how easily it might be brought to passe, with maruelous great profit: and that king Agis beganne also to strayne her with great intreatie, that she would willingly depart with her goods to winne her fonne honor and glory: who though he could not in money and riches come to be like vnto other kinges (bicause the slaves and factors onely of the kinges Seleucus and Ptolomy, had more money then all the kings of SPARTA had together that ever raigned) yet if in temperance, thriftines, & noble mind (exceeding all their vanities) he could come to restore the LACED EMONIAN sagaine vnto equalitie: that then in deede he should be counted a noble king. These women being stirred up with ambition by these perswassons of the younge man, seeing him so nobly bent, as if by the goddes their mindes had secretly bene inflamed with the loue of vertue : did presently alter their mindes in such fort, that they them selues did pricke forward Agis, and sent for their friends to pray and intreate them to favor his enterprise: and furthermore, they brought on other women also, knowing that the LACEDE-MONIANS did ever heare and beleue their wives, fuffering them to understand more of the af- How louing fayres of the state, then they them selues did of their private estate at home. Herein is to be the lacedaconfidered, that the most part of the riches of LACED & MON Was in the handes of the women, who their and therefore they were against it, not onely bicause thereby they were cut of from their fine- wines. nes and excesse, in the which being ignorant of the true good in deede, they put all their felicitie: but also, bicause they sawe their honor and authoritie which they had by their riches. cleane troden under foote. Therefore they comming to Leonidas, they did perswade him to reproue Agis, bicause he was elder man then he, and to let that this enterprise went not forward. Leonidas did what he could in fauour of the riche, but fearing the common people, who defired nothing but alteracion, he durst not openly speake against him, but secretly he did the best he could to hinder Aque practise, talking with the Magistrates of the citie, and accusing Agis vnto them, he told them how he did offer the riche mens goods vnto the poore; the dinision of their landes, and the abolishing of all detts, for rewarde to put the tyrannie into his handes, and that thereby he got him a stronge gard vnto him selfe, but not many Citizens vnto Sparta. This notwithstanding, king Agis having procured Lyfander to be chosen one of the Ephores, he presently preserved his lawe vnto the counsell. The articles whereof were silver. these: That fuch as were in debt, should be cleered of all their debts, and that the landes also should be divided into equal partes: so that from the valley of Pallena vnto mount Taugetus, and vnto the cities of Malea, and Selasia, there should be source thowsand sine hundred partes, and without the se boundes, there should be in all the rest, sisteene thowsand partes, the which should be distributed vnto their neighbours meete to cary weapon: and the rest vnto the natural Spartans. The number of them should be replenished with their neighbours and ftraungers in like manner, which should be very well brought vp, and be able men besides to ferue the common wealth: all the which afterwards should be divided into fifteene companies, of the which, some should receive two hundred, & others foure hundred men, & should liue according to the olde auncient institucion observed by their auncestors. This lawebeing A preferred vnto the Senate, the Senators grewe to divers opinions apon it. Whereuppon La-lander him selfe assembled the great counsell of all the people, and there spake vnto them him selfe, and Mandroclidas, and Agesilans also, praying them not to suffer the honor of Sparta to oracles of the goddes, warning them to beware of auarice, as of the plague and destruction of the common wealth: and of the late oracle also brought vnto them, from the temple of Page phaé. The temple and oracle of Pafiphaé, was famous at the citie of THALAMES: and some fav. that Paliphae was one of the Daughters of Atlas, which was gotten with child by Impiter, & was delinered of a fonne called Hammon . Other thinke that it was Caffandra, one of king Priamus Daughters that died there, which was furnamed Pasiphae, bicause she gaue all the aunswers & R oracles of things to come. But Phylarchus writeth, that Daphne the Daughter of Amyela, flying from Apollo that would have rauished her, was turned into a lawrell tree, and honored by Apol-to with the gift of prophecie. So, they faid that this oracle of the god commaunded them, that the SPARTANS should againe returne vnto their former auncient equalitie, stablished first by Lycureus lawe. When every man els had spoken, king Agis rising vp, briefly speaking vnto the people, fayd: that he would bestowe great contributions for the reformation of this common wealth, which he was defirous to reftore againe. For first of all, he would make common all his errable and pasture he had, and besides that, he would adde to fix hundred talents in rea-Meji maketh all his errable and patture he nad, and beinges that, he would adde to ha minuted takents in teaching made come dy money, and so much should his mother, grandmother, kinsemen and friendes, all the which were the richest and wealthiest in Sparta. When the people heard what he sayd, they mar- o uelled much at the noble minde of this younge king, and were very glad of it, saying: that for three hundred yeares space together, the citie of Spart a had not so worthy a king as he. But Leonidas contrarily affayed with all his power he could to reful him, thinking with him felfe. that if king Aqu purpose tooke place, he should also be compelled to doe as he did, and yet he should have no thankes, but king Agis: bicause that all the Spartans indifferently should be compelled to make their goods in common, but the honor should be his onely that first beganne it. So he asked Agis, whether he thought Lycurgus had bene a good and just man or not. Agus aunswered, that he had bene. Then replyed Leonidas, did you euer see that he had taken away and abolished any detts, or had receyued straungers into the number of the Citizens of SPARTA? Who contrarily thought his common wealth unperfect, if all straungers were not D banished the citie. Agis agayne aunswered him: that he maruelled not that Leonidas beeing brought vp in a straung contry, and also maryed there in a noble mans house, he should be ignorant of Lyeurgus lawes, who banishing gold and filuer out of his citie, did therewithall exile dette and lending. And for straungers, he hated them that woulde not conforme them selues vnto the manners and facions of life which he instituted, and those they were which he banished: not for any ill will he bare vnto their persons, but bicause he seared their manners of life, least that mingling them with the Citizens, they should make them runne after vanitie and couetousnes to be riche. For otherwise, Terpander, Thales, and Pherecydes, which were all straungers, were maruelously renerenced and honored in SPARTAin olde tyme, bicause they did finge in their writings, the felfe same thinges which Lyeurgus had established in his lawes. B And thou thy felfe also doest commend Ecprepes, being one of the Ephores, bicause he did cut with a hatchet the two stringes which Phrynis the Musitian had added vnto the Citherne, more then the seuen common stringes, and those also which did the like vnto Timotheus: and yet thou reprouest me, bicause I goe about to roote out all excesse and pride out of Sparta as though those men did not farre of preuent that these superfluous stringes of the musicke, delighting the Citizens mindes too much with their fonges, should not cause them fall vito fuch trade and manner of life, as should make the citie at discord with it selfe. After this contencion, the common people did sticke vnto king Agis, and the riche men followed Leonidas, praying and perswading him not to forsake them: and further, they did so intreate the Senators, in whom confifteth the chiefe authority, to determine and difgest all matters before they F be propowned vnto the people that they ouerthrew the law, by the onely voice of one man more. Wherefore Lysander who was yet in office, attempted to accuse Leonidas by an aunci-

a entlawe, forbidding that none of the race of Hercules should mary with any straining woman. nor beget children of her: and fayde further, that no man vpon payne of death should dwell any where, but in Sparta. When he had instructed others to object these thinges agaynst Leonidas, he with other of his colleagues observed a signe in the element, the ceremony wherof was in this forte: Euery nynenth yeare, the Ephori chufing a bright night without moonelight, did fit downe in some open place, and beheld the starres in the element, to see if they faw any starre shoote from one place to another: if they did, then they accused their kinges that they had offended the goddes, and did deprine them of their kingdom, vntill fome oracle came from De LPHES Or Olympus, to restore them againe. Lylander then declaring that he had King Leonifeene a starre flie in the element, did therefore accule king Leonidas, and brought forth witness by Lylander. R fes against him: how he had maried a woman of Asia, the which one of king Selencus Lieuetenants had given him in mariage, & that he had two children by her: & afterwards being forfaken of his wife that refused him, he returned againe into his contry against his will, &s so had nosselfested the kingdom for lacke of lawful heire. So following his acculation in this manner against him, he allured Cleombrotus his sonne in law, being also of the kings blood, to make title to the crowne. Leonidas being affraid of the successe hereof, tooke sanctuary in the temple of Juno, surnamed Chalceactos, & his Daughter with him, who for sooke her husband Cleombrotus. Leonidas then being cited to appeare in person, & making default, they deposed him, & made Leonidas de-Cleombrotus king. In the meane time Lyfanders office expired, & the new Ephori which fucce primed of his ded him, did deliuer Leonidas againe, and accused Lysander & Mandroclidas, bicause against the c law, they had abolished all debts, & had againe made newe division of lands. When they sawe they were openly accused, they incensed both the kinges, that joyning together, they shoulde make the Ephores ordinaunces of no effect : declaring that their authority was onely erected for the discord of the two kings, bicause they should give their voices vnto that king that had the best judgemet & reason, whe the other would wilfully withstand both right & reason. And therfore, that they two agreing together, might lawfully do what they would, without cotrolment of any person: & that to result the kings was a breaking of the lawe, sith that by right the Ephori had no other privileage & authority, but to be judges & arbitrators between the when there was any cause of larre or controuersie. Both the kings being caried away by this perswafion, went into the market place accopanied with their frends, plucked the Ephores from their D seares, & put others in their roomes, of the which Agesilauwas one. Eurthermore, they armed agreat number of yong men, & opening the prisons, did fet the prisoners at liberty, the which made their aduersaries affraid of the, doubting some great murther would have followed ypon it, how beit no man had any hurt. For Agefilans being bene to kill Leanidas, who fled ynto the ci- Leonidas flyty of TEGEA, & having also laid men in waite for him by the way: king Agis hearing of it fent "" thither other frends of his in whom he put great confidence, & they did accopany Leonidas, & brought him fasely vnto the city of T B GHA. Thus their purpose taking effect, & no man corra- King Agin de rying the one man only Agefilaus ouerthrew all, & dashed a noble Liaconian law by a sham-ceimed by Aful vice, which was couetournes. For he being a great landed man, & hauing the helftlands of any man in the contry & owing a great fumme of money befides: would nether pay his detts. E nor let go his land. Wherfore he perswaded king des, that if he wes about to stabilith both together, he fliould raise a great votore in the city, & withall, if he did first winne them that were landed men, preferring at the beginning the cutting of of dets only, then that they would cafely & willingly also accept the law for partition of lands. Lylander was also of his opinioniwhere 26 land by king Agis & he both were deceived by Agefilaus fubtlety. So they comautided at the credi- flabilihed by tors to bring their bonds, obligations, & bils of det (which the Lincop & Montans do cal Cla monion, ria)into the market place, and there laying them on a heape together, they did fet fire of them. When the viurers & creditors law their writings obligatory aftrey they departed thence with heavy harrs: but Agefilaus mocking the faid, he never faw a brighter fire in his life. The people looked daily that the ATOLIANS coming through the contry of MEGARA, would invade Pr. A LOP ONNES VS. Aratm general of the ACHAIANS had leaused a great army to withstad their inuasion. & had also written vnto the Ephores, that they should send the aide. Wheruppon, they presently sent king Agu, perceiuing also the readines and good wil of the souldiers which were appointed to go with him. For the most of the were young men & needy, who seing the selues discharged of the feare of their dets, & hoping also at their return, that the lads likewise should be deuided among the they went with glad harts, & were obedient vnto king Agis. So that the cities where through they passed, wondred how they came through all Paloponnasys from the one fide to the other, very quietly, without noyfe or offence to any man. Likewife many GRECIANS calling to mind the afficient times, told one another, that it was a noble fight then to see the army of LACED EMON, whe they were led by Agesilaus, Lysander, & Leonidas, famous R captaines: fith now they faw so great obedience vnto Agis by his fouldiers, who was in maner the yogest ma of all his campe. Who also glorying to be cotet with litle, to away with paines

therby a maruelous loue of the people. How beit the rich me liked not this chaung, & were affraid lest Agis should give other people example to rife also, & to do the like with theirs, ashe had done. Agu meting with Aratus by the city of Corinths, even as he was confulting whether he should fight with his enemy or not shewed him self in his cousel, then no rash, but arefolute & valiant man. For he told him, that for his opinion he thought it better to fight, & not to fuffer the warre to come any further leaving the entry into PELOPONNES VS free to their enemy:neuertheles, that he would do what Aratus thought good, bicause he was the elder, and o general also of the Achaians, whom he came not to comaund, but to aide the But Baton St. NOPIAN Writeth, that king Agis would not fight, though Aratus was willing: how beit he had not red that which Aratus had writte for his excuse & instificatio, alleaging there, that the farmers & husbadme having brought all the corne into their barnes, he thought it better to fuffer the enemies to come further into the contry, rather then to hazard battel, to the loffe of the whole COTTY Of PELOPONNESVS, & that therfore he licenced al the confederatisto depart, & brake vp his army. So king Agis returned home again, greatly honored of al the that ferued with him in this iorney, finding the city of SPARTA the in great broile & trouble. For Agefilaus at that time being one of the Ephores, finding him felf rid of the feare which before kept him vnder: cared not what injury or mischief he did to any citizen, so he might get money. For amongest other n things, that very yere he made the pay beyond al reason the tallages & taxes due vnto the como wealth for thirtene moneths, adding to the thirtenth moneth, about the ordinary time of the yere. Wherfore perceiuing every ma hated him, se being affraid of the he had offended the kept fouldiers about him, armed with their fwords, & fo came downe into the market place among the. And for the two kings, he made no accopt of the one: but of the other that was Aqui, he semed outwardly to make good accopt, rather for kinreds sake, the for his dignity of a king, & furthermore gaue it out abroad, that he would also be one of the Ephores the next yere following. Wheruppo, his enemies spedely to preuent the dauger, gathered force together, & opely brought king Leonidas from TEGEA, to restore him again to his kingdo. The people were glad to see that bicause they were angry they had bene mocked in that fort for that the landes E were not deuided according vnto promise. Furthermore, Hippomedon was so welbeloued for his valiantnes of every ma, that intreating the people for his father Agesilans, he saved his life, & got him out of the city. But for the two kings, Agis tooke fancturary in the teple of Iuno Chalceaecos. And Gleobrotus the other king fled into the teple of Neptune: for it femed that Leonidas being much more offeded with him, did let king Agu alone, & wer against him with certe soldiers armed. The he sharply taunted him, that being his sonne in law, he had conspired against him to deprive him of his kingdo. & had drive him out of his contry. But then Cleambrotas not hauing a word to fay, fate stil, & made him no answer. Wheruppo his wife Chelonis, the daughter of Leonidas, who before was offended for the iniury they did her father, & had left her husdas daughter, band Cleobrotus, that had viurped the kingdo from him, to ferue her father in his aduerfity, and F ther and hus. while he was in fanctuary tooke part with him alfoof his milery, & afterwards whe he wetvnto the city of TEGEA, ware blacks for forow, being offeded with her husbadishe contrarily the chaunging

All me wodering, & weping for pity, to fee the goodnes & natural love of this Lady, who shewing her mourning apparell, & heare of her head flaring about her eyes, bare headed : fhe spake in The oration this fort vnto her father. O father mine, this forowfull garmet & countenance is not for pity of the Daneher Cleombrotus, but hath long remained with me, lamenting fore your former mifery & exile: but of Leonida. now, which of the two should I rather choose, either to cotinue a mourner in this pitiful state. feing you again restored to your kingdom, having ouercome your enemies; or els putting on " my princely apparel, to fee my husband flain, vnto whom you maried me a maid? who, if he " can not moue you to take copassion of him, and to obtein mercy, by the teares of his wife and " childre: he shalthen abide more bitter paine of his euil counsel, then that which you intend to

Also, with what face can I loke apon other ladies, whe I could never bring my father to pity, by any interceffio I could make for my husband, neither my husband, intrearing him for my father: & that my hap is to be borne, a daughter & wife alwaies most vnfortunat,& despised of mine owne? And for my husbad, if he had any reason to do that he did, I the " tooke it from him, by taking your parte, and protesting against him; and contrarily, your selfe "

Chelonis pitifully complaying in this r force; putting her face upon Cleombratus head, cast her swollen and blubbering eyes apon the flanders by. Wherefore Leonidas after he had talked a litle with his friendes, he commaunded The banifla-Cleombrotus to get him thence, and to leave the citie as an exile: and prayed his Daughter for Cleombrotus his fake to remayine with him, and not to for fake her father, that did fo dearely loue her, as for her fake he had forced her husbands life. This notwithstanding, she would not yeelde to his requestibut riffing up with her husband, gaue him one of his sonnes, and her selftooke the other inher armes raind then making her prayer before the altar of the goddeffe, the went as a banithed wonian away with her husband. Then Leonidas having banished king Cleombrotus out of the Cleombrotus. city;& remoning the first Ephores, had substituted other in their place: he presetly bethought forgiuen him all that was past, bicause they knew he was deceived, & subtely circumuented by Agefiland craft; being a young man, ambitious of honor Age would not leave the fanctuary for Leonidas cunning perswafion, but mistrasted all than he said vnto him: Wherefore, Leonidas would no more beguile him with faire words. But Amphares, Demochares, & Arcefilaus, did oftetimes go to visitiking Agis, & otherwhile also they got him out of the sanctuary with them vnto the bath & brought him backe againe into the temple, when he had bathed. But Amphares Amphares be-E having borowed not long before certein rich apparel & plate of Agelifizata, bicaufe he would mayed king not redeliuer the againe, he determined to betray king Aqui, his mother, & grandmother. And him howe he might craftily come by king Agis. First, he perswaded him to come out of the fanctuary, & to go general the kingdom fafely with him, declaring vato him that his citizens had itis reported that he chiefly did ferue Leonidas turne, & prouoked the Ephores (of which number he was one against Acis. Now therefore, Acis keping all the rest of his time within the teple faving when he went apon occasion to the bath other determined to intercept him by the way & to take him when he was out of the fanctuary. So they watched him one day when he bathed & came & faluted him as their maner was & feemed to accompany him foorting, & being mery with him as with a young mantheir famillion But when they came to the turning of a streete that went towardes the prison, Amphares laying hold on him, beeing one of the Ephores, faid vnto him! I arreft thee Agis, & wil bring thee before the Ephores, to give accompt King Agis ca

The Ephores wet into the prison, & sent vnto some of the Sec nate to come vnto them, whom they knew to be of their mind: then they comaunded Aguan if it had bene judicially, to give accompt of the alteracion he had made in the comon wealth. The younge man laughed at their hypocrifie. But Amphares told him that it was no laughing. sport, & that he should pay for his folly. Then another of the Ephores seeming to deale more fauorably with him & to thew him a way how he might escape the condenation for his fault. asked him, if he had not bene intifed vnto it by Agefilans, and Lyfander. Agu aunswered, that no man compelled him, but that he onely did it to follow the steppes of the auncient Lycurgusto. bring the common wealth vnto the former estate of his graue ordinaunce & institution. Then the same Senator asked him againe, if he did not repent him of that he had done. The younge R man boldly aunswered him, that he would neuer repent him of so wise and vertuous an enterprise, though he ventred his life for it. Then they condemned him to death, and commaunded the Sergeants to cary him into the Decade, which was a place in the prison where they were strangled, that were condemned to dye. Demochares perceiving the Sergeaunts durst not lay hold of him, & likewise that the souldiers which were straungers, did abhorre to commit such the beather, a fact, contrary to the law of God and man, to lay violent hands upon the person of a king; he onto the per- threatned & reuiled them, and dragged Agis perforce into that place called the Decade, Now the rumor ranne straight through the citie, that king Agis was taken, &ca multitude of people were at the prison dores with lights & torches. Thither came also king Age mother & grandmother, shreeking out, & praying that the king of Sparta might yet be heard and judged by o the people. For this cause, they hastned his death the sooner, and were afraid besides, least the people in the night would take him out of their hands by force, if there came any more people thither. Thus king Agis being led to his death, spied a Sergeaut lamenting & weeping for him, vnto whom he faid: good fellowe, I pray thee weepe not for me, for I am honefter man then they that so shamefully put me to death, & with those words he willingly put his head into the halter. Amphares then going out of the prison into the street, found Agelistrata there, king Agia mother, who straight fel downe at his feete: but he taking her vp againe, in old famillier manner, as being her very friend, told her that they should doe king Agis no hart, & that the might if the would, goe & fee him. Then the prayed, that they would also let her mother in with her,

But when they were within he first game Archidamia wate the Serges king sais, dores be shut after them. But when they were withing the mather aunts to be put to death, who was a maruelous olde woman, and had lived more honorably aunts to be put to death, who was a maruelous olde woman, and had lived more honorably vnto that age, then any Lady or Mattone befide her in the citie. She being executed, he commaunded Agesistrata also to come in. Who when she sawe the bodye of her dead sonne layed on the ground,& her mother also hanging on the gallowes: she did her selfe helpe the hangman to plucke her downe, and layed her body by her formes. Then having covered her in decent manner, the layed her downe on the ground by the corps of her forme day, and killing his cheeke fayd: out, alas my fonne, thy great modeftie, goodnes and clemencie, brought thee and vs vnto this deathe. Then Amphares peeping in at the dore to fee what was done; hear ring what the fayde, came in withall in a greate rage, and fayde: I perceyue thou hast also B beene of counsell with thy fonne, and fithe it is so, thou shalt also followe him. Then the rifing likewise to be strangled, sayd: the goddes graunt yet that this may profit Sparta. This horrible murther beeing blowen abroad in the citie, and the three dead bodies also brought out of prison: the feare though it were great amongest the people, could not keepe them back from apparant show of griefe, and manifest hate against Leonidas and Amphares, thinking that there was neuer a more wicked and crueller fact committed in Sparta, fince the Dortans came to dwell in PELOPONNESVS. For the very enemies them felues in partell, would not will lingly lay hands vpon the kings of LACED EMON, but did forbeare as much as they could posfible, both for feare & reuerence they bare vnto their maieftic. For in many great battels & coflicts which the LACED & MONIANS had against the GRECIANS, there was never any king of # LACED & MONflain, before Philips time, but Cleobrotus only, who was flain with a dart at the battellof Lever Res. Some write also, that the Messenians hold opinio, that their Ariffomenes

A flucking Theopompus: howbeit the LACED EMONIANS fayde, that he was but hurt, not flavne. But hereof there are divers opinions: but it is certain that Agis was the first king whom the Ephores ever put to death: for that he had layd a plat of a noble deuise, and worthy of SBARTAS being of that age when men doe easily pardon them that offend; and was rather to be accused of his friendes and enemies, bicause he had saued Leonidas life, & had trusted other men, as the best natured younge man that could be.

Now Agis having suffered in this fort, Leonidas was not quicke enough to take Archidamus Harebeginhis brother also, for he fled presently. Yet he brought Agis wife out of her house by force, with net life. a litle boy the had by him, and maried her vnto his fonne Cleomenes, who was yet vnder age to Cleomenes the marye: fearing least this younge Ladye should be bestowed els where, beeing in deede a great sonne of Leon heire, and of a riche house, and the Daughter of Gylippus, called by her name Agiatis, besides Meidis the that the was the fayrest woman at that tyme in all GRECE, and the vertuousest and best con- Daughter of dicioned. Wherefore, for divers respects she praied the might not be forced to it. greatly in fancy with her, and for compassions sake (as it seemed) he thanked her for the loue maryed anto the bare vnto her first husband, and for the louing remembraunce the had of him : infomuch Cleomene. as he him felfe many times would fall in talke of it, and would be inquifitiue how thinges had passed, taking great pleasure to heare of Agis wise counsell and purpose. For Cleomenes was as desirous of honor, and had as noble a minde as Agis, and was borne also to temperancie and moderation of life, as Agis in like manner was: howbeit, he had not that shamefast modestic and lenitie which the other had, but was somewhat more sturring of nature, and readier to put any good matter in execution. So he thought it greate honestie to bringe the Citizens if he could, to be contented to live after an honest forte: but contrarily, he thought it no dishoneflie to bringe them vnto good life, by compulsion also. Furthermore, the manners of the Citizens of Sparta, giving them selves over to idlenes and pleasure, did nothing like him at all: neither that the king did fuffer the common wealth to be ruled as they lifted, fo no man impeached his pleasure, and that they did let him alone: insomuch no man regarding the profit of the common wealth, euery man was for him felf, and his familie. And contrarily, it was not lawfull for any man to speake for the exercises of the youth, for their education in temperan-D cie, and for the restoring againe of equality of life, the preferment whereof was the only cause came to LACED EMON, and louingly stayed there to teache younge men and children. He of Bory street was one of the chiefest schollers of Zenon CITIAN, and delighted (as it seemed) in Cleomenes noble minde, and had a great defire to pricke him forward vnto honor. For, as it is reported; that the auncient Leonidas beeing demaunded what Poet he thought Tyrtaus to be, aunswered he was good to flatter younge mens myndes: for he fette their hartes a fire by his verses, when they beganne to fight any battell, fearing no daunger, they were fo incoraged by them. So the Stoicke discipline is somewhat daungerous, for the stowte and valiant myndes, which E otherwise doth make them desperate: but when they are joyned vnto a graue and gentle nature, first it lysteth up his hart, and then maketh him taste the profit thereof. Nowe Leonidae (the father of Cleomenes) beeing deceased, and he him selfe comen vnto the crowne, finding that the Citizens of Spartaat that tyme were very diffolute, that the riche men followed their pleasure and profit taking no care of the common weale, that the poore men also for very want and neede went with no good life and courage to the warres, nether cared for the bringing up of their children, and that he him felfe had but the name of a king, and the Ephori the absolute authoritie to doe what they listed: at his first comming to his kingdome, he determined to alter the whole state and gouernment of the common wealth. hearfe thefe things vnto him, declaring every thing what had passed. But when he found that A Cleomenes was affected vnto king Agis intent, & still defired to heare of it: then Xenares sharply and angrily reproued him, and tolde him he was not wife, nor well aduised, and at length would no more come and talke with him as he was wont, yet making no man priuve why he abstevned from comming to him, but told them that asked him, he knewe a cause well enough why, Xenares nowe having thus refused him, and thinking all the rest woulde doe the like to bringe this matter to passe, he tooke this resolution with him selfe. Bicause he thought he might the rather doe it in warre, then in peace, he fet the citie of Sparta and the Achai-ANS at variance together: who did them felues give the first occasion to be complayed you pon. For Aratus beeing President and chiefe of all the ACHAIANS, had practised a longe tyme to bringe all Peloponnesvs into one bodye: and had therefore onely fufteyned great p troubles in warres, and at home in peace: thinking that there was no other waye to deliner them from forreyne warres. Nowe when he had wonne all the other people to be of his opinion: there remained no more but the ELIANS, the LACED EMONIANS, and a few of the Ar-CHADIANS, which were subject vnto the LACED & MONIANS. When king Leonidas was deade. Aratus beganne to inuade the Archadians, those specially that bordered apon the Argi-VES: to proue how the LACED & MONIANS would take it, making no accompt of Cleomenes being but a young king, & had no experience of warres. Thereuppon the Ephori fent Cleomenes VINTO A THENIVM (a temple of Minerus hard by the citie of Belbina) with an armie to take it bicause it was a passage & entry into the contry of LACONIA, howbeit the place at that time was in question betwixt the MEGALOPOLITANES, and the LACED EMONIANS. Cleomenes got it, and fortefied it. Aratus making no complaint otherwise of the matter, stale out one night with his army to fet apon the TEGEANS, and ORCHOMENIANS, hoping to have taken those cities by treason. But the traitors that were of his confederacy, their harts failed them when they should have gonne about it: so that Aratus returned, having lost his iorney, thinking that this fecret attempt of his was not discourred. But Cleomenes finely wrote vnto him as his friend. and asked him, whether he had led his armie by night: Aratus returned aunswer againe, that vinderstanding Cleomenes ment to fortifie Belbina, he went forth with his armye, thinking to haue let him. Cleemenes wrote againe vnto him, and faid he did beleeue that which he foake was true: howbeit he earnestly requested him, (if it were no trouble to him) to aduertise him why he brought schaling ladders and lightes after him. Aratus smiling at this mocke, asked p what this young man was. Democritus LACED EMONIAN being a banished man out of his cotry, aunswered: if thou hast any thing to doe against the LACED & MONIANS, thou hadst neede make haste, before this young Cockerel haue on his spurres. Then Cleomenes being in the field in the contry of Archadia, with a few horsemen and three hundred sootemen onely: the Ephori being affraid of warres, sent for him to returne againe. His backe was no sooner turned, obeying their commaundement : but Aratus sodainly tooke the citie of CAPHYES. Thereuppon the Ephori incontinently fent Cleomenes backe again with his armie: who tooke the fort Cleomenes ior of Methydrium, and burnt the borders of the Argives. The Achaian's came against him with an army of twenty thowsand footemen, and a thowsand horsemen, led by Aristomachus: Cleomenes met with them by the city of PALANTIV M, and offred battell. But Aratus quaking at E the hardines of this young man, would not fuffer Aristomachus to hazard battell, but went his way, derided by the Achaians, and despised by the Laced & Monians: who in all were not aboue fine thow and fighting men. Cleamenes corage beeing now lift vp, and brauely speaking to his citizens: he remembred them of a faying of one of their auncient kings, that the LACE-DEMONIANS neuer inquired what number their enemies were, but where they were. Shortly after, the A CHAIANS making warre with the E LIANS, Cleomenes was fent to avde them, & met with the armie of the Achaians by the mountaine Lyceum, as they were in their returne: he fetting apon them, gaue them the ouerthrowe, flue a great number of them, and tooke many also prisoners, that the rumor ranne through GRECE, how Aratus selfe was slaine. Cleomenes wisely taking the occasion which this victory gaue him: he went straight to the citie of MAN-F TINE A and taking it upon a fodaine, when no man knew of his comming, he put a strong garrison into it, Now the LACED EMONIANS harts failing them, and resisting Cleomenes enterpri-

Which when the murtherers of king Agis vnderstoode, being affraid that Archidamus returning from exile, he would be reuenged of them: Archidamus they fecretly received him into the citie, and founde the meanes to bring him into Sparta, king Agus But when they had him, they put him straight to death, whether it was vnwitting to Cleomenes (as Phylarchus plainly testifieth) or else with his privitie, suffring them to make him away. by perswasion of his frends, But it is a cleere case, the citie was burdened withall bicause probable matter fell out that they had compelled Cleomenes to doe it. Neuerthelesse, he holding R fill his first determination, to alter the state of the common wealth of Sparta, as soone as he could possible: he so fed the Ephores with money, that he brought them to be contented he thould make warre. He had also won many other citizens by the meanes of his mother Crateficles, who furnisht him with money, that he lacked not to honor him withall : and further, maried as it is reported, (being otherwise not ment to mary) for her sonnes sake, vnto one of the wealthieft men of all the citie. So Cleomenes leading his army into the field, wanne a place within the territorie of MEGALOPOLIS, called LEVCTRA. The ACHAIANS also being quickly come to their aide, led by Aratus: they straight fought a battell by the citie felfe, where Cleomenes had the worst on the one side of his armie. Howbeit Aratus woulde not suffer the A-CHAIANS to follow them, bicause of bogges and quauemyres, but sounded the retreate. But C. Infladas 2 MEGALOPOLITAN being angrie withall, caused the horsemen he had about him to follow the chase, who pursued so fiercely, that they came amongest vines, walls, and ditches, where he was driven to disperse his men, and yet coulde not get out. For Lysadas corps, he caused it to be brought vnto him, and putting a purple robe apon it, and a crowne on his head, sent it in this aray vnto the very gates of the city of MEGALOPOLIS. It was that felfe Lyfiadas, who gening Douer the tyranny and gouernment of MEGALOPOLIS, made it a popular state, and free city, Lyfadas, pt. and ioyned it to the ACHAIANS. He declaring this dreame the next morning vnto Cleomenes, it somewhat troubled him at the first, thinking that he came to feele him, for that he had heard some inckling of his intent. But when he perswaded him selfe that the other ment good faith, and lyed not vnto him, being bolder then before, he went forward with his purpose, and taking with him vnto the campe all those Spartans which he suspected to be against his enterprise, he went and tooke the cities of HERE A and ALSEA, confederats of the ACHAIANS, and vitteled ORCHOMENA, and went and camped before the citie of MANTINEA. In fine, he so wearied F & ouerharried the LACED EMONIAMS by long iorneys, that at length they befought him he

Furthermore, for them that fate still and sturred not, they killed not a man of them, neither did keepe any man that was defirous to goe out of the citie: but moreouer, they pardoned Agefilaus, who came the next morning out of the chappell of Feare, A-Diners siples mongest the LACED & MONIANS in the citie of Sparta, there are not onely temples of search and death, but also of laughter, and of many other such passions of the minde. They do worof fuch other Thippe Feare, not as other spirites and deuills that are hurtfull but bicause they are perswaded, that nothing preserueth a common wealth better then seare. Wherefore the Ephori (as Aristotle witnesseth) when they are created, doe by publicke proclamacion commaunde all the SPARTANS to shaue their chinnes, and to obey the law, least they should make them feele the rigour of the law. They brought in the shauing of their chinnes, in my opinion, to inure youg C men to obey the Magistrates euen in trifles. Moreouer it seemes that men in olde time did esteeme fortitude to be no taking away of seare, but rather a seare & lothnes to incurre shame.

of feare, loyned to the halle of the Ephores. The oration of king Cleaching the first original of the Ephores.

For men do vie to reuerence them whom they feare. And this was the cause why the chappell of Feare was by the halle of the Ephores, having in maner a princely and absolute authoritie. The next morning Cleomenes banished by trompet, foure score citizens of Sparta, and ouerthrew all the chaires of the Ephores but one only, the which he referued for him felfe to fit in to gene audience. Then calling the people to counfell, he gaue them an account of his doings, and told them that Lycurgus had joyned the Senators with the kings, & how the citie had bene gouerned a long time by them, without helpe of any other officers. Notwithstanding, afterwards the city having great warres with the MESSENIANS, the kings being alwaies E employed in that warre, whereby they could not attend the affaires of the common wealth at home, did choose certaine of their frendes to sitte in judgement in their steades, to determine controuerfies of lawe: which were called Ephores, and did gouerne long time as the kinges ministers, howbeit that afterwards, by litle and litle, they tooke apon them absolute gouernment by the selues. And for manifest proofe hereof, you see that at this present time when the Ephori do send for the king, the first and second time, they refuse to come, but the third time Astropus, the he riseth and goeth vnto them. The first man that gaue the Ephores this authoritie, was Asteropus, one of the Ephores many yeares after the first institucion of the kinges: and yet if they had gouerned discreetely, peraduenture they might have continued lenger. But they licentioully abusing their authoritie, by suppressing the lawfull Gouernors instituted of old time, ta- F king apon them to banish some of their kings, and putting other of them also to death, without law and inflice, and threatning others that defire to restore that noble and sormer blessed

A gouernment vnto Spart aggaine: all these things I say, are in no wife to be suffered any lenger. And therefore, if it had bene possible to have banished all these plagues of the common wealth out of Sparta, brought from forreine nations: (I meane, pleasures, pastimes, money, dets, and viuries, and others yet more auncient, pouerty and riches)he might then have esteemed him selse the happiest king that euer was, if like a good Phisitian he had cured his contrie of that infection, without griefe or forrow. But in that he was constrained to beginne with blood, he followed Lycurgus example: who being neither king nor other Magistrate, but aprivate citizen only, taking apon him the authoritie of the king, boldly came into the market place with force and armed men, and made king Charilaus that then raigned, so affrayed, that he was driven to take fanctuarie in one of the temples. But the king being a Prince of a R noble nature, and louing the honor of his contrie: tooke parte with Lyeurgue, adding to his aduife and counfell, for the alteracion of the state of the government of the common wealth, which he did confirme. Hereby then it appeareth, that Lyeurgue faw it was a hard thing to alter the common wealth without force and feare: the which he not withflanding had veed with as great modestie and discretion, as might be possible, banishing them that were against the profit and wealth of LACED EM ON, gening all the lands of the contrie also to be equally denided amongest them, and setting all men cleere that were in detre. And furthermore, that he would make a choyle and proofe of the straungers, to make them free citizens of Sparta. whom he know to be honeft men, thereby to defende their citie the better by force of armes; to thend that from henceforth we may no more fee our contrie of LACONIA spoyled by the C. ET OLIMNS and LLLY RIAMS, for lacke of men to defende them felues againft them. Then he Cleomene tebeganne first him selfe to make all his goods common, and after him Megistonus his father in formeth the law, and confequently all his other frendes. Then he caused the lands also to be deuided, and comm wealth ordeined every banished man a part, whom he him selfe had exiled, promising that he would of Lacedan receive them againe into the city, when he had established all things. So when he had replenithed the number of the citizens of SPARTA, with the choycest honest men their neighbours: he made foure thow and footemen well armed, and raught them to vie their pykes with both handes, in steade of their dartes with one hande, and to carie their targets with a good strong handle, and not buckled with a leather thong. Afterwardes he tooke order for the education of children, and to reftore the auncient LACONIAN discipline againe; and did all these things Din maner by the helpe of Spherus the Philosopher. Insomuch as he had quickely fer vp againe schoole honses for children, and also brought them to the old order of dyet: and all, but a very fewe, without compulsion were willing to fall to their old institucion of life. Then bicause the name of one king should not offend any man, he made his brother Euclidas king with him. But this was the first time that euer the two kings were of one house but then. Furthermore, understanding that the Achaians and Aratus were of opinion, that he durst not come out of

LACED AMON, for feare to leave it in perill of revolting, bicause of the late change and alte-

Thereupon he inuaded the territories of the Cleomenes in-MEGALOPOLITANS, and brought away a great praye and booty, after he had done great hurt madeth the borders of the E vnto his enemies. Then having taken certaine players and minstrells that came from Mass 1- Megalopal-NA, he sette vp a stage within the enemies contrie, made a game of 40. Minas for the victor,

The bord being taken vp, an other litle table was brought with three feete, whereupon they fet a bolle of copper full of wyne, and two filter cuppes of a pottell a peece, and certaine other fewe filter pottes besides: so every man dranke what they listed, and no man was forced to drinke more then he woulde. Furthermore, there was no sporte, nor any pleasaunt song, C foung, to make the companie merie, for it needed not. For Cleomenes felfe would entertaine them with some pretie questions, or pleasaunt tale: whereby, as his talke was not seuere and without pleasure, so was it also pleasaunt without insolencie. For he was of opinion, that to winne men by gifts or money, as other kings and Princes did was but bafe and clovnelike but to feeke their good wills by curteous meanes, and pleafauntnes, and therewith to meane good faith, that he thought most fit and honorable for a Prince. For this was his minde, that there was no other difference between a frend and hyerling: but that the one is wonne with money. and the other with civility & good entertainment. The first therefore that received king Cleamenes into their citie, were the MANTINIANS, who opened him the gates in the night, and helping him to drive out the garrison of the ACHAIANS, they yeelded them selves vnto him. D But he referring them to the vie and government of their owne lawes and libertie, departed from thence the same day, and went vnto the citie of TEGEA. Shortly after, he compassed aleadeth his bout Arcadia, and came vnto Pheres in Arcadia determining one of the two either to geue the ACHAIANS battell, or to bring Aratus out of fauor with the people, for that he had fuffred him to spoyle and destroy their contry. Hyperbat as was at that time Generall of the A-CHAIANS, but Aratus did beare all the fway and authoritie. Then the ACHAIANS comming into the field with all their people armed, and encamping by the citie of DYMES, neere vnto the temple of Hecatombeum: Cleomenes going thither, laye betweet the citie of Dymes that was against him, and the campe of his enemies, which men thought a verie vnwise parte of him. Howebeit valliantly prouoking the ACHAIANS, he procured them to the battell, ouer- E threw them, made them flie, and flue a great number in the field, and tooke many of them alfo prisoners. Departing from thence, he went and set apon the citie of LANGON, and draue the garrison of the Achaians out of it, and restored the citie against vnto the Elians. The ACHAIANS being then in verie hard state, Aratus that of custome was won; to be their Generall, (or at the least once in two yeares) refused now to take the charge, notwithstanding the ACHAIANS did specially pray and intreate him: the which was an ill act of him, to let an other steere the rudder, in so daungerous a storme and tempest. Therefore the A CHATANS sent Ambassadors vnto Cleomenes to treate peace, vnto whome it seemed he gaue a verie sharpe aunfwere. After that, he fent vnto them, and willed them only to refigne the figniorie of G R # CR vnto him: and that for all other matters he would deale reasonably with them, and presently F deliuer them vp their townes & prisoners againe, which he had taken of theirs. The Achai-ANS being glad of peace with these condicions, wrote vnto Cleomenes that he shoulde come AGIS AND CLEOMENES. where the citie of Lerna, where the dyet and generall affemblie shoulde be kept to consult thereupon. It chaunced then that Cleomenes marching thirder, being very hotte, dranke cold water, and fell of fuche a bleeding withall, that his voyce was taken from him, and he almost fifiled. Wherefore he fent the ACHAIANS their chiefest prisoners home againe, proroging the parlament till an other time, and returned backe to LACED BMON. It is supposed certainly, that this let of his comming to the dyet, was the onely cause of the ytter destruction of GRECE: the which otherwise was in good way to have risen againe, and to have bene delinered from the prefent mileries, and extreame pride and conetournes of the MACED ONIANS. For Aratus, either for that he trusted not Cleomenes, or for that he was affrayed of his power. or that he otherwise enuied his honor & prosperitie, to see him risen to such incredible great-Rues in fo short a time, and thinking it also too great shame and dishonor to him, to suffer this young man in a moment to deprive him of his great honor & power which he had possessed folong time, by the space of thirtie yeares together, ruling all GRECE: first, he sought by force to terrifie the Acharans, and to make them breake of from this peace. But in fine, finding that they litle regarded his threats, & that he could not preuaile with them, for that they were affrayed of Cleomenes valliantneffe and corage, whose request they thought reasonable. for that he fought but to restore PELOPONNESVS into her former auncient estate againe: he fell then into a practise farre vnhonest for a GR & CIAN, verie infamous for him selfe, but most dishonorable for the former noble acts he had done. For he brought Antigoniu into GR ACE, Aratus medand in his age filled the contrie of Peloponnesy swith Macedonians, whom he himselfe for to his com-C in his youth had driven thence, had taken from them the castell of Coninthe, and had alwayes bene an enemie of the kinges (but specially of Antigonus, of whom before he had spoken all the ill he coulde, as appeareth in his wrytings, faying that he tooke maruelous paines, and did put him felfe into many daungers, to deliuer the city of ATHENS from the garrison of the MACED ON IANS) and yet notwithstanding he brought them armed with his owne hands, not into his contrie only, but into his owne house, yea even into the Ladies chambers & clofersidifdaining that the king of LACED BMON, diffeending of the blood royall of Hercules (who fetting vp againe the auncient maner of life of his contrie, did temper it as an inftrument of musicke out of tune, and brought it to the good, auncient and sober discipline and Donican life instituted by Lycurgue) should be called and wrytten, king of the Sicyonian stand of the D TRICE MIANS. And furthermore, flying them that were contented with browne bread, and with the plaine course capes of the LACEDEMONIANS, and that went about to take awaye riches (which was the chiefest matter they did accuse Cleomenes for) and to provide for the poore: he went and put him felfe and all Achain vnto the crowne and diadeame, the purple robe, and prowde imperious commaundementes of the MACEDONIANS, fearing least men should thinke that Cleomenes coulde commaunde him. Furthermore his follie was such, that having garlands of flowers on his head, he did facrifice vnto Antigonus, & fing longs in praife of his honor, as if he had bene a god, where he was but a rotten man, confumed away. This that we have written of Aratus (who was indued with many noble vertues, & a worthy GRE-CIAN) is not fo much to accuse him, as to make vs see the frayely and weakenes of mans na-E ture: the which, though it have neuer to excellent vertues, can not yet bring forth such perfit frute, but that it hath over fome mayme and bleamiffie. Now, when the Achanas were met againe in the citie of And os, to hold the fession of their parlament before proroged, and Cleamenes also being come from TEGEA, to be arthat parlament: euerie man was in hope of good peace. But Aratus then, who was agreed before of the chiefest articles of the capitulacions with Antigonus, fearing that Cleomenes by fayre words of force would bring the people to graunt that he defired; fent to let him viderstand, that he should but come him selfealone into the citie, and for fafetie of his person they would gette him three hundred oftages or otherwife, if he would not leave his armie; that then they would gette him audience without the citie, in the place of exercises, called Cyllarabium, When Clebmenes had heard their aun-F fwere, he told them that they had done him wrong; for they fhould have advertised him of it before he had taken his iorney, and not now when he was almost hard at their gates, to fende him backe againe, with a flea in his care. Thereuppon he wrote a letter vnto the counfell of the ACBAIANS, altogether full of complaintes against Aratus. On thother side also, Aratus in A

his oration to the counsell, inueyed with bitter wordes against Cleomenes. Thereuppon Cleon menes departing with speede, sent a Herauld to proclaime warres against the Achaians, nor in the city of ARGOS, but in the city of ÆGION, 25 Aratus wryteth, meaning to fet apon them being vnprouided. Hereuppon all ACHAIA was in an vprore : for divers cities did presente reuolt against the Acharans, bicause the common people hoped after the diuision of lands. and the discharging of their dettes. The noble men also in many places were offended with ratus, bicause he practised to bring the MACED ONIANS into the contrie of PELOPONNESYS. Cleamenes therefore hoping well for all these respectes, brought his armie into ACHAIA, and at his first comming tooke the citie of PALLENA, and draue out the garrison of the ACHAI-ANS: and after that, wanne also the cities of Phenevm, and Pentelivm. Now the Achai-R ANS fearing some treason in CORINTHE and SYCIONE, sent certaine horsemen out of the citie of ARGOS, to keepe those cities. The ARGIVES in the meane time, attending the cele. bracion of the feaft at the games Nemeea, Cleomenes thinking (which fell out true) that if he went to A RGO s, he should finde the citie full of people that were come to see the seastes and games, and that affailing them vppon the fodaine, he shoulde put them in a maruelous seare brought his armie in the night hard to the walls of the citie of ARGOS, and at his first comming wanne a place they call Aspis, a veriestrong place about the Theater, and ill to come vnto. The ARGIVES were so amazed at it, that no man would take apon him to desende the citie, but receiued Cleomenes garrison, and gaue him twentie oftages, promising thenceforth to be true confederates vnto the LACED & MONIANS, vnder his charge and conduct. The C which doubtles wanne him great fame, and increased his power: for that the auncient kings of LACED EMON, could never before with any policie or deuise, winne the citie of Argos. For king Pyrrhus one of the most valliantest and warlikest Prince that euer was, entring the citie of ARG os by force, could not keepe it, but was flaine there, and the most parte of his armie:wherby, euery man wondred greatly at the diligence & counsell of Cleomenes. And where euery man did mocke him before, when Cleomenes fayd that he would follow Solon, and Lycurgus, in making the citizens goods common, and discharging all dets: they were then clerely perswaded that he onely was the cause and meane of that great chaunge, which they sawe in the corage of the Spart ans: who were before so weake and out of hart, that they having no corage to defend them felues, the ATOLIANS entring LACONIA, with an armie, tooke away D at one time, fiftie thow and flaues. Whereuppon an old man of Spart a pleafauntly fayd at that time, that their enemies had done them a great pleasure, to ridde their contrie of Laco-NIA of fuche a rabble of rafcalls. Shortly after, they being entred againe into the former auncient discipline of Lyeurgus, as if Lyeurgus selfe had bene aliue to have trained them vnroits they shewed them selues verie valliant, and obedient also vnto their Magistrates, whereby they recovered agains the commaundement of all GRECE, and the contribulity of PELO-PONNESVS. After Cleomenes had taken the citie of ARGOS, the cities also of CLEONES, and PHLIVNTA, did yeelde them selves vnto him. Aratus in the meane time remayned at Co-RINTHE, & there did bufily accuse them which were suspected to favor the LACED EMONI-ANS. But when newes was brought him that A RG os was taken, & that he perceived alfothe E citie of Comin's He did leane vnto Gleomenes parte, and draue away the Achaians: he then calling the people to counsell in Corinthe, secretly stale to one of the gates of the citie, and causing his horse to be brought vnto him, tooke his backe, and gallopped for life vnto the citie of Sicyons. When the Corinthians heard of it, they tooke their hosebackes also, striuing who shoulde be there soonest, and posted in suche hast vnto Cleomenes at the citie of A a cos, that many of them (as Aratus wryteth) killed their horses by the waye : howebest Gleomenes was verie mucho offended with thems for that they had let him scape their handes. But Aratu layth further, that Megistonus came voto him from Cleomenes, and offered him a great furtime of money to deliuer him the castell of Contatt, wherein there was agree garrison of the A'CHAIANS. But he aunswered againe, that thinges were not in his power, but F rather that he was subject to their power. Now Cleomenes departing from the city of Angos, Difercame the Tros zenians, the Epidavrians, & the Hermsonians. After that, he came

A vnto CORINTHE, and presentlie entrenched the castell there roundeabout, and sendinge for Aratus frendes and factors, commaunded them to keepe his house and goodes carefullie for him, and fent Tritymallus MESSENIAN againe vnto him, to praye him to be contented that the castell might be kept indifferentlie betweet the ACHAIANS and LACED E-MONIANS, promifinge him privately to double the pencion that kinge Ptolomy gave him. But Aratus refusinge it, sent his sonne vnto Antigonus with other oftages, and perswaded the ACHAIANS to deliuer uppe the castell of CORINTHE, unto Antigonus handes, Cleomenes understandinge it, entred with his armie into the contrie of the Sicyonians, and destroyed it as he went, and tooke Aratus goodes and money, of the gift of the Co-RINTHI ANS by decree. Nowe Antigonus in the meane tyme, beinge passed the moun-R tayne of Gerania with a greate power: Cleomenes determined not to fortifie the Isthmus or fireight of PELOPONNESVS, but the wayes of the mountaynes Onienes, determininge to keepe euerie one of them against the MACHDONIANS, with intent to consume them rather by tyme, then to fight a battell with an armie, so good fouldiers and well trayned as they were. Cleomenes followinge this determination, did putte Antigonus to greate trouble, bicause he had not in time provided for corne: and coulde not winne the passage also by force, for that Cleomenes kept it with suche garde and souldiers. Then Antigonue stealinge secretely into the hauen of Lechæum, he was stowtly repulsed, and lost a number of his men: whereuppon Cleomenes and his men beinge couragious for this victorie, went quietly to supper. Antigonus on thother side fell into dispaire, to see him C selfe brought by necessitie into suche harde termes. Wherefore he determined to goe to the temple of Iuno, and from thence to passe his armie by sea into the citie of Sicyone, the which required a longe tyme, and greate preparation. But the same night there came fome of Aratus frendes of the Argives, who comminge from Argos by fea, brought The Agines newes that the ARGIVES were rebelled against Cleomenes. The practifer of this rebellion. doerebellawas one Aristoteles, who easelie brought the people vnto it, that were alreadie offended with Cleomenes, that had promifed to paffe a lawe for the clearinge of dettes i but performed it not according to their expectacion. Wherefore, Aratus with a thowsande fine hundred men which Antigonius gaue him, went by sea vnto Epidavava. Howebeit Aristoteles taried not his comminge, but takinge them of the citie with him, went and D belieged the garrison of the LACED EMONIANS within the castell, beinge ayded by Timoxenus, with the ACHAIANS that came from SICYONB. Cleamenes receiving advertisement hereof, about the seconde watche of the night, sent for Megistonse in haste, and commaunded him in anger speedilie to goe and ayde their men that were in the citie of A n-Gos. For it was Megistonus him selfe that promised Cleomenes the fidelitie of the Arag-VES, and that kept him from drivinge them out of the citie, which he suspected. So sendinge him awaye foorthwith with two thowsande men, he attended Antigonus; and comforted the Corinthians the best he coulde: advertisinge them that it was but a little mutinic of a fewe, that chaunced in the citic of Arcos. Megistonic beinge come to Ar-60s, and flayne in battell, fightinge for the LACED EMONIANS in garrifon there (who be-E inge in greate diffresse, scant able to keepe the castell against the enemies) sent fundrie messengers vnto Cleomenes, to praye him to sende them immediate ayde . Cleomenes then beinge affrayed that the enemies havinge taken Angos, woulde stoppe his way to returne backe into his contrie, who having e oportunitie fafelie to fpoyle LACONIA, and alfo to besiege the citie selfe of Sparta, that had but a fewe men to defende it : he departed with his armie from CORINTHE. Immediatly after came Antigonies, and tooke it from him, Cleomenes left and put a stronge garrison into it. When Cleomenes came before the citie of Arrow, he the citie of fealed the walles, and breakinge the vawtes and arches of the place called Afris antiedin, Corimbe. to the citie, and joyned with his garrison there, which yet refisted the Acharassia and takinge other partes of the same also, assaulted the walles, and cleared the streetes in suche F forte, that not an enemie durft be seene, for feare of the archers of the CRETANS. In the meane time, when he fawe Antigonus a farre of, comminge downe the hilles into the val- chomene lost ley with his footemen, and that his horsemen also came apon the spurre into the chie; the citie of DDDD

tyme he had conquered muche, and had almost wonne all within PELOPONNESUS; in thorter space also, he lost all againe. For, of the confederates that were in his came, some did presentlie forfake him: others also immediatly after surrendered up the townes vnto Antigonus. Cleomenes beinge thus oppressed with the fortune of warre, when he came backe to TEGEA with the rest of his armie, newes came to him in the night from LACEDE MON. The death of which grieved him as muche as the losse of all his conqueltes: for he was advertised of the death of his wife Agiatis, whome he loued so dearelie, that in the middest of his chiefest prosperitie and victories, he made often iomeys to SPARTA to see her. It coulde not but be a maruelous griefe vnto Cleomenes, who beinge a younge man, had lofte fo vertuous and R faver a younge Ladie, so dearelie beloued of him : and yet he gaue not place vnto his sorowe, neither did griefe ouercome his noble courage, but he vied the selfe same voyce, apparell, and countenaunce, that he did before. Then taking order with his private Captaines. abouthis affayres, and havinge provided also for the safetie of the TEGEANS: he went the next morninge by breake of daye vnto SPARTA. After he had privately lamented the forowe of his wines death, with his mother and children: he prefentlie bent his minde againe to publike causes. Nowe Cleomenes had sent vnto Ptolomy kinge of ÆGYPT, who had promised him ayde, but apon demaunde, to haue his mother and children in pledge. So he was a longe tyme before he woulde for shame make his mother privile vnto it, and went oftentymes of purpose to lette her vnderstande it : but when he came, he had not the harte C. to breake it to her. She first suspectinge a thinge, asked Cleomenes frendes, if her some had not somewhat to saye vnto her, that he durst not vtter. Whereuppon, in fine he gaue the venter, and brake the matter to her. When the heardeit, the fell a laughinge, and tolde him: why, howe commeth it to passe, that thou hast kept it thus long, and wouldest reficles, Cles. not tell me? Come, come, sayed she, put me straight into a shippe, and sende me whither thou wilt, that this bodie of myne may doe some good vnto my contrie, before crooked age consume my life without profitte. Then all thinges beinge prepared for their iorney, they went by lande, accompanied with the armie, vnto the heade of Tænarus. Where Cratelicles beinge readie to imbarke, the tooke Cleomenes aside into the temple of Neptune, and imbracinge and kiffinge him, perceiuinge that his harte yerned for forowe of her departure, D the faved vnto him: O kinge of LACED & MON, lette no man fee for thame when we come out of the temple, that we have wept and dishonored Sparta. For that onely is in our power, and for the rest, as it pleaseth the goddes, so lette it be. When she had spoken these wordes, and facioned her countenaunce againe: the went then to take her thippe, witha litle fonne of Cleomenes, and commaunded the maister of the shippe to hoyse sayle. Nowe when the was arrived in ÆGYPT, and vnderstoode that kinge Ptolomy received Ambassadours from Antigonus, and were in talke to make peace with him: and hearinge also that Cleomenes beinge requested by the ACHAIANS to make peace with them, durft not hearken to it, and endethat warre, without king Ptolomyes confent, and bicause of his mother : she wrote vinto him, that he shoulde not spare to doe any thinge that shoulde be expedient for E the honour of SPARTA, without feare of displeasing Ptolomy, or for regarde of an olde woman, and a younge boye. Suche was the noble minde of this worthie Ladie in her fonne Cleomenes aduersitie. Furthermore, Antigonus having taken the citie of TEGEA, and sacked the other cities of O RCHOMENVM, and MANTINEA: Cleomenes feeinge him felfe brought to defende the borders onely of LACONIA, he did manumife all the ILOTES, (which were the flaues of LACED BMON) paying effue Attica Minas a man. With that money he made the famme of fine hundred talentes, and armed two thowlande of these freed slaues after the MACED ONIAN facion to fight against the LEVCASPIDES: (to witte, the white thieldes of Antigonus) and then there fell into his minde a maruelous greate enterprise, vnlooked for of every man. The citie of Magalipolis at that time being as great as Sparta, & F having the aide of the Achaians, and Antigonus at hand, (whom the Achaians as it feemed had broughter, chiefly at the request of the Magazopolitans) Cleomenes determininge

A to facke this citie, and knowing that to bring it to passe, nothing was more requisite then celeritie: he commaunded his fouldiers to vittell them selues for fine dayes; and marching with the choyce of all his armie towardes Selasia, as though he had ment to have spoyled the ARGIVES, fodainly turning from thence, he inuaded the contrie of the MEGALOPOLI-TANS, and supping by ROBTIVM, went straight by ELICVNTA vnto the citie. When he was come neere vnto it, he fent Panteas before with speede, with two bandes of the LACED & MO-NIANS, and commaunded him to take a certeine pece of the wall betwene two towers, which he knewe was not kept nor garded: and he followed him also with the rest of his armie comming on fayer and foftly. When Panteas came thither, finding not onely that place of the Clement wall without gard or watche which Cleomenes had told him of, but also the most parte of that wanne the B side without defence : he tooke some parte of the wall at his first comming, and manned it. sine of Meand ouerthrew an other peece of it also, putting them all to the sword that did defend it, and then came Cleomenes, and was within the citie with his armie, before the MEGALOPOLI-TANS knewe of his comming. At length, the citizens understanding that the citie was taken, some fled in hast, conveying suche light things as came to hande, in so great a feare : and the others also arming them selues, ranne together to resist the enemies. But though they valliantly fought to repulse them out of the citie, and yet prenayled not: they gaue the rest leifure thereby to flye and faue them felues, fo that there remayned not behinde, about a thowfandemen. For all the rest were sed with their wives and children, into the citie of MESSE-NA. The most parte of them also that fought with the enemies, saued them selues, and verice C fewe were taken, the chiefest whereof, were Lylandridas, and Thearidas, the noblest persons that were amongest the Megalopolitans: wherefore when the souldiers had taken them.

they brought them vnto Cleomenes. Lyfandridas, when he faw Cleomenes a good way of, cried out alowde vnto him : O king of LACED MMON, this day thou hast an occasion offered thee to doe a more famous princely acte, then that which thou hast alreadie done, and that will make thy name also more glorious. Cleomenes musing what he woulde request: well (o he) what is that thou requirest? One thing I will tell thee before hande, thou shalt not make me restore your citie to you againe. Yet, of Lysandridas, lette me request thus muche then, that ye doe not destroy it, but rather replenishe it with frendes and confederates, which hereafter will be true and faithfull to you: and that shall you doe, geuing the MEGALOPOLITANS

D their citie againe, and preserving suche a number of people as have forsaken it. Cleomenes pawfing a while, aunswered, it was a hard thing to beleue that: but yet q he, let honor take Champing place with vs, before profit. After that he fent a Heraulde straight vnto M BSSBNA vnto them noble squing that were fledde thither, and tolde them that he was contented to offer them their citie againe, fo that they would become good frendes and confederates of the LACED EMONIANS, for saking the alliance of the ACHAIANS. Philopæmen would by no meanes suffer the MEGA-LOPOLITANS to accept this gracious offer of Cleomenes, nor also to leave their alliance with the ACHAIANS: telling them, that he ment not to geue them their citie againe, but to take them also with their citie: and therefore draue Thearidas and Lylandridas out of MESSENAS that moued this practife. It was that Philopamen that afterwardes was the chiefest man of E the ACHAIANS, and that wanne suche fame and honor among the GRECIANS, as we have particularly declared in his life. This worde being brought to Cleomenes, who had kept the city from spoyling untill that time: he was then so thorowly offended, that he gaue the goods Clements to in praye to the fouldiers, fent away their goodly tables, images, and pictures vnto Spar- fed the citie TA, and defaced the chiefest partes of the citie, and then returned home againe, being af- of Megalipefrayed of Antigonus, and the Achaians. Howebeit they sturred not, bicause of the parlament that was kept at that time in the citie of ÆGIVM, where Aratus being in the pulpit for orations, and holding his gowne a long time before his face, the people maruelling at it, willed him to tell what he ayled: he answered them, MEGALIPOLIS is taken, and rased by Cleomenes. The Achaian's being amazed at the fodainnes of this great loffe, straight brake of their

F parlament and affemblie. But Antigonus thinking to ayde them, fent prefently for all his garrifons, who being long a comming, he willed them to flay where they were, and he him felfe taking a fewe fouldiers with him, went vnto the citie of ARGOS. Therefore the seconde enterprise of Cleamenes, seemeth at the first sight a verie rashe and desperate attempt: howe. A beit Polybius wryteth, that it was an attempt of greate wisedome and policie. For Cleomenes understanding that the MACEDONIANS were dispersed in garrisons in divers places, and that Antigonus lay all the winter in the citie of ARGOS, with a certeyne number of foote. men that were straungers: he inuaded the contrie of the ARGIVES with his armie, perswading him felfe, that either Antigonius woulde for shame come and fight with him, or if he did not, that then he shoulde put him in disgrace with the ARGIVES: which in deede came fo to passe. The ARGIVES seeinge their contrie spoyled by Cleomenes, were in a maruelous rage, and gatheringe together at Antigonus lodginge, they cryed out vnto him, either to goe into the fielde, and fight with the enemie: or elle if he were affrayed, to refigne his office of Generall of GRECE, vnto others that were vallianter than him felfe. But Antieg. R nue like a wife and excellent Captayne, thinkinge it a dishonour to him rashely to put him selfe in daunger, and his frendes also, though he were prouoked with many injuries and opprobrious wordes : woulde not goe into the fielde, but stoode constant in his first determination. Then Cleomenes having brought his armie hard to the walles of the citie of Angos, and spoyled and destroyed the contrie rounde about : without lette or daunger he fafely returned home againe. Within a while after, Cleomenes beinge aduertised that tigonus was come vnto TEGEA, with intent to inuade the contrie of LACONIA: he goinge an other way with his armie, (vnwitting to his enemies) they wondered when they faw him in the morning by the citie of ARGOS, spoylinge their contrie, and cuttinge downe their come, not with fickles and knyues as other doe vie, but with long poles in forme of Sythes, C that the fouldiers as they went fportingewife, did ouerthrowe and fpoyle it. But when they came to the place of exercises in the suburbes, called Cyllabaris, certaine of the souldiers goinge about to haue sette it afire, Cleomenes woulde not suffer them, and tolde them. that what he had done at MEGALIPOLIS, it was rather angrily then honestlie done. Now Antigonus, presentlye returninge backe againe, beinge minded first to haue gone directly to the citie of ARGOS, but sodainely alteringe his minde, did campe vpon the toppe of hilles and mountaynes. Cleomenes seeminge not to be affrayed of him, sent Herauldes to him to desire the keyes of the temple of Iuno, and then after he had done sacrifice. he woulde departe his waye. Thus mockinge Antigonus, after he had facrificed vnto the goddesse, vnder the temple that was shut vp, he sent his armie vnto PHLIVNTA, D and havinge driven awaye the garrison out of O LOGVNTA, he came vnto the citie of ORCHOMENVM, havinge not onely incouraged his citizens, but gotten even amongest the enemies them felues, a fame also to be a noble Captaine, and worthie to manage greate affaires. For euerie man judged him to be a skillfull fouldier, and a valliant Captaine, that with the power of one onely citie, did mainteine warre against the kingdom of MACEDON, against all the people of PELOPONNESVS, and against the treasure of so greate a king: and withall, not onely to keepe his owne contrie of L A C O N I A vnfoyled, but farre otherwise to hurte his enemies contries, and to take so many greate cities of theirs. But he that fayed first, that money was the sinewe of all thinges, spake it chiefly in my opinion, in respect of the warres. Demades the Orator sayed on a time, when the B ATHENIANS commaunded certaine gallies shoulde be put out of the arsenall into the fea, and presently rigged and armed with all possible speed, though they lacked money: he that rules the prowe, must first see before him. Meaning, munition and vittells must be prouided, before the shippes be sette out. And it is reported also, that the auncient Archidamus, when the confederates of the LACED EMONIANS at the beginninge of the warre of PELOPONNES VS required, that they might be sessed at a certeine rate, aunswered : the charges of warre haue no certeyne stinte. For like as wrestlers that exercise their bodies continuallie in games, are better able to wrestle, and ouerthrowe them with tyme, that have no strength, but onely arte and slight: even so Kinge Antigonus, who by the greatnesse of his kingdome did defraye the charge of this warre, did wea- F rie and ouercome Cleomenes at the length, bicause he lacked money bothe to payethe straungers that served him, and also to mayntayne his owne citizens. For otherwise, doubtlesse the time served his turne well, bicause the troubles that sell apon Antigoniu in his realme, did make him to be sent for home. For the barbarous people his neighbours, in his absence did spoyle and destroye the realme of MACEDON, and speciallie the ILLYRIANS of the high contrie that came downe then with a greate armie: whereupon, the MACEDONIans being spoyled and harried on all sides by them, they sent poste vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come home. If these letters had bene brought him but a litle before the battell, as they came afterwardes: Antigonus had gone his waye, and left the ACHAIANS. But fortune, that alwayes striketh the stroke in all weightiest causes, gaue suche speede and fauour The power of vino time : that immediatly after the battell was fought at SELASIA, (where Cleomenes loft fortune, his armie and citie) the verie messengers arrived that came for Antigonus to come home, mixiclesn the which made the ouerthrowe of king Cleomenes so muche more lamentable. For if he menes and the which made the outstituons of any presentation that the made the description of the which had delayed battell but two dayes lenger, when the Macedonians had bene gone, he might as schiffe. haue made what peace he would with the Achaians: but for lacke of money, he was driven (as Polybius wryteth) to geue battell, with twentie thowfande men, against thirtie thowfande: where he shewed him selse an excellent and skilfull Captaine, and where his citizens alfo fought like valliant men, and the straungers in like case did shewe them selves good souldiers. But his onely ouerthrowe was, by the manner of his enemies weapons, and the force of their battell of footemen. But Phylarchus wryteth, that treason was the cause of his ouerthrowe. For Antigonus had appointed the Acarnanians, and the Illyrians which he had in his armie, to steale uppon the winge of his enemies armie, where Euclidas, king. r Cleomenes brother was, to compasse him in behinde, whilest he did sette the rest of his men in battell. When Cleomenes was got up upon some hill to looke about him, to see the countenaunce of the enemie, and feeing none of the Acarnanians, nor of the Illyrians he was then affrayed of Antigonus, that he went about some stratageame of warre. Wherefore he called for Demoteles, whose charge was to take heede of stratageames and secret ambulhes, and commaunded him to looke to the rerewarde of his armie, and to be verie circumspect all about. Demoteles, that was bribed before (as it is reported) with money, tolde The media him that all was cleere in the rerewarde, and bad him looke to ouerthrowe his enemies be- of Demoister. fore him. Cleomenes trufting this reporte, fette forward against Antigonus, and in the ende. his citizens of Sparta which he had about him, gaue fuche a fierce charge apon the squa-D dron of the MACED ONIAN footemen, that they draue them backe fine furlonges of . But in the meanetime, Euclidas his brother, in the other wing of his armie, being compassed in behinde, Cleomenes turning him backe, and feeing the ouerthrowe, cried out alowde: alas, good brother, thou art but slaine, yet thou dyest valliantlie, and honestlie, and thy death shall be a worthic example vnto all posteritie, and shall be song by the praises of the women of Sparta. So Euclidas and his men being flaine; the enemies came straight to sette you Cleomenes winge . Cleomenes then feeing his men discouraged, and that they durst no lenger Cleomenes . ressift the enemie , fledde, and saued him selfe. Many of the straungers also that served him, by duige. were flaine at this battell : and of fixe thow fande Spartans, there were left aliue but onely men. two hundred. Now Cleomenes being returned vnto Spart a, the citizens comming to fee him. E he gaue them counsell to yeeld them selues vnto Antigonus the conqueror: and for him selfe; if either aliue or dead he could doe any thing for the honor and benefit of SPARTA, that he would willingly doe it. The women of the citie also, comming vnto them that flying had escaped with him, when he saw them wnarme the men, and bring them drinke to refresh them with : he also went home to his owne house. Then a maide of the house, which he liad taken in the citie of MEGALIPOLIS (and whom he had enterteined euer fince the death of his wife) came vnto him as her maner was, to refresh him comming hot from the battell howbeit he would not drinke though he was extreame drie, nor fit being verie wearie, but armed miserie we are in, without any honor or profitte in our death. And therefore, I am of opinion, that we shoulde not yet cast of the hope we have to serue our contrie in time to come: ,, but when all hope fayleth vs, then we may eafely make our felues awaye when we lift. Thereunto Therecion gaue no aunswere, but as soone as he founde oportunitie to slippe from Cleomenes, he went to the sea side, and slewe him selfe. Cleomenes hoysinge sayle from the Ile of ÆGIALIA, went into AFRICKE, and was brought by the kinges feruauntes vnto the citie of ALEXANDRIA. King Ptolomy at his first comming, gaue Cleomenes no special good, but indifferent intertainment : but after that he had shewed him selfe to be of great wisedom F and judgement, and that Ptolomy faw in the simplicity of his LACONIAN life he had also a noble disposition and corage, nothing degenerating from the princely race & blood of Hercules, thee to feeke death, which is the eafiest matter, and the presentest vnto any man, that can be:

inhabitants he found, and did offend no man, nor prowdly despise the auncient honor and dia A gnitie of Spart A: but referring them to their owne lawes and gouernment, when he hadfacrificed to the goddes for his victorie, he departed from thence the thirde daye, newes being brought him that the warre was verie great in M ACEDON, and that the barbarous people did spoyle his contrie. Now a disease tooke him, whereof he dyed afterwards, which appeared a tificke, mixt with a fore catarre: but yet he yeelded not to his disease, and bare it out, that fighting for his contrie, and obteyning a famous victorie, with great flaughter of the barbarous people, he might yet dye honorably, as in deede he did, by Phylarchus testimonie, who fayth, that with the force of his voyce, fiercely crying out in the middelt of his fight, he rare his lunges and lightes, worse then they were before. Yet in the schooles it is sayd, that after he had wonne the battell, he was so ioyfull of it, that crying out, O blessed day: he brake out R into a great bleeding at the mouth, and a great feuer tooke him withall, that he dyed of it.

Thus much touching Antigonus. Now Cleomenes departing out of the Isle of CYTHERA, Went and cast ancker in an other Iland, called ÆGIALIA. Then determining to faile ouer to the citie of Cyrena, Therycion, one of Cleomenes frendes (a man that in warres shewed him selfe verie valliant, but a boafter befides of his owne doinges) tooke Cleomenes afide, and favd thus vnto him: Truely O king, we have lost an honorable occasion to dye in battell, though enery aliue, but dead. A feconde occasion yet is offered vs to dye, with much lesse honor and fame not withflanding, then the first. Whether doe we faile to no purpose? A and that he yelded not to his advertitie: he tooke more delight in his company, then in all the company of his flatterers and hangers on him: and then repented him greatly, that he had made no more account of him before, but had fuffered him to be ouerthrowne by Antigonus, who through the victory of him, had maruelously enlarged his honor and power. Then he began to comfort Cleomenes, and doing him as great honor as could be, promifed that he would fend him with shippes and money into GR ECE, and put him againe into his kingdom: & further gaue him an annual pencion in the meane time, of foure and twenty talents, with the which he simply and soberly enterteyned him selfe and his men about him: and bestowed all the rest apon his contry men that came out of GRECE into ÆGYPT, But now, old king Ptolomy deceating before he could performe the promife he made vnto Cleomenes, to fend him into RGRECE: the Realme falling then into great lascinionsnes, dronckennes, and into the gouernment of women, his case and miserie was cleane forgotten. For the young king his sonne was so given ouer to women and wine, that when he was most sober, and in his best witts, he most disposed him selfe to make feastes and facrifices, and to have the taber playing in his Court, to gather people together, like a stage player or ingler, whilest one Agathoclea his lemman, and her mother, and Oenanthes a bawde, did rule all the affayres of the state. But when he came to be king it appeared he had neede of Cleomenes: bicause he was affraid of his brother Magas, who by his mothers meanes, was very wel esteemed of among souldiers. Wherefore he called Cleomenes to him, and made him of his priny counsel, where he denised by practise, which way to kill his brother. All other his friends that were of counfell with him, did counfell him to do Cit: but Cleomenes onely vehemently diffwaded him from it, and tolde him, that if it were posfible, rather moe brethren should be begotten vnto the king for the safetic of his person, and for deuiding of the affayres of the kingdome betweene them. Amongest the kinges familliers that was chiefest about him, there was one Sosibins that said vitto Cleomenes: so long as his bro-

of those hiered straungers, there are three thowsand PELOPONNESIANS, which he knewe at the twinckling of an eye, would be at his commaundement, to come with their armor & weapon where he would appoynt them. These words of Cleomenes at that tyme shewed his fayth and good will he bare vinto the king, and the force he was of befides. But afterwards, Ptolomyes D fearefulnes increasing his mistrust: (as it commonly hapneth, that they that lacke wit thinke it the best fasetie to be searefull of every wagging of a strawe, and to mistrust every man) the remembrance of Cleomenes wordes made him much suspected of the Courtiers, understanding that he could doe so much with the souldiers that were straungers; insomuch as some of them fayd, see (meaning Cleomenes) there is a lyon amongest sheepe. In deede, considering his facions and behauior, they might well fay so of him: for he would looke thorough his fingers as though he faw nothing, and yet faw all what they did. In fine, he required an armie & ships ther Magas lived, the fouldiers that be straungers, whom the king entertayned, would never

TO LIANS were at great warres together, and that the affaires of his contry did call him home, all Peloponnesvs being in armes and vprore, he prayed that they would licence him to de-E part with his friends. But neuer a man would give eare vnto him, and the king also heard nothing of it, bicause he was continually entertained among Ladies, with banckets, danneing,& maskes. But Sosibius that ruled all the Realme, thought that to keepe Cleomenes against his wil, were a hard thing, and also danngerous: and to let him goe also, knowing that he was a valiant man, and of a sturring minde, and one that knew the vices and imperfections of their gouernment: he thought that also no safe way, sithe no giftes nor presents that could be offered him, could fosten him. Nicagor as on a time had fold Cleomenes certein land, but was not payed for it, either bicanfe he had no present money, or els by occasió of the warres which gaue him no leasure to make payment. Cleamenes one day by chaunce walking vpon the fandes, he fawe Nicagoras landing out of his shippe, being newly arrived, and knowing him, he curteously welcomed him, and asked what wind had brought him into Acypt. Nicagorus gently saluting him againe, tolde him that he had brought the king excellent horse of service. Cleomenes smiling, told him, thou haddest bene better haue brought him some curtisans & daunsers, for they would haue pleafed the king better: Nicagor as faintly laughed at his aunswer, but within few dayes after he did put him in remembraunce of the land he fold him, and prayed him then that he would helpe him to money, telling him that he would not have prest him for it, but that he had fusteyned h losse by marchandise. Cleomenes aunswered him, that all his pension was spent he had of the king. Nicagoras being offended with this aunswer, he went and told Sosibius of the mocke Cleamenes gaue the king. Sosibius was glad of this occasion, but yet desiring further matter to make the king offended with Cleomenes, he perswaded Nicagoras to write a letter to the king against Cleomenes, as though he had conspired to take the citie of CYRENA, if the king had given him shippes, money, and men of warre. When Nicagoras had written this letter, he tooke shippe, and hoysed sayle. Foure dayes after his departure, Sosibius brought his letter to the king, as though he had but newly received it. The king apon fight of it was so offended with Cleomemes, that he gaue present order he should be shut vp in a great house, where he should haue his ordinary dyet allowed him, howbeit that he should keepe his house. This grieued Cleomenes Q much, but yet he was worfe affraid of that which was to come, by this occasion: Ptolomy the fonne of Chryfermu, one of the kings familliers, who had oftentimes before bene very converfant and famillier with Cleomenes, and did franckly talke together in all matters: Cleomenes one daye sent for him, to praye him to come vnto him. Ptolomy came at his request, and samilliarly discoursing together, went about to disswade him from all the suspicions he had, and excused the king also for that he had done vnto him: so taking his leave he lest him, not thinking that Cleomenes followed him (as he did) to the gate, where he sharply tooke up the souldiers, laying, that they were very negligent and careles in looking to fuch a fearefull beaft as he was, & fo ill to be taken, if he once scaped their handes. Cleomenes heard what he sayd, and went into his lodging againe, Ptolomy knowing nothing that he was behind him: and reported the very D wordes againe vnto his friendes. Then all the Spartans connecting their good hope into anger, determined to be reuenged of the iniurie Ptolomy had done them, and to dye like noble S PARTANS not tarying til they (hould be brought to the shambles like fat weathers, to be sold and killed. For it would be a great shame and dishonor vnto Cleomenes, having refused to make peace with Antigonus, a noble Prince and warrier: to tary the kinges pleasure till he hadlest his dronckennes and daunfing, and then to come and put him to death. They beeing fully refolued hereof, as you have heard: king Ptolomy by chaunce went vnto the citie of CANOBYS, & first they gaue out in ALEXANDRIA, that the king minded to set Cleomenes at libertie. Then Cleamenes friendes obseruing the custom of the kings of Ao YPT, when they ment to set a prifoner at libertie (which was, to fend the prisoners meare, and presents before to their supper) B did fend vnto him fuch manner of prefents, & fo deceived the fouldiers that had the keeping of him, saying, that they brought those presents from the king. For Cleomenes him selfe did sacrifice vnto the goddes, and fent vnto the fouldiers that kept him, parte of those presents that were lent vnto him, and supping with his friendes that night, made mery with them, every man being crowned with garlands. Some fay, that he made the more hafte to execute his enterprise, sooner then he would have done, by meanes of one of his men that was privye vnto his conspiracie: who went euery night to lye with a woman he kept, and therefore was affraid left he would bewray them. Cleamenes about noone, perceiuing the fouldiers had take in their cuppes, and that they were a fleepe: he put on his coate, and vnripping it on the right shoulder, went out of the house with his sword drawen in his hand, accompanied with his friends, F following him in that fort, which were thirty in all. Amongest them there was one called Hippotas, who being lame, went very lively out with them at the first: but when he saw they went

A faier and foftly bicause of him, he prayed them to kil him, bicause they should not hinder their enterprise for a lame man, that could doe them no seruice. Notwithstanding by chaunce they met with a townes man a horsebacke, that came hard by their dore, whome they pluckt from his horse, and cast Hippotas vppon him: and then ranne through the citie, and cryed to the people, libertie, libertie. Now the people had no other corage in them, but onely commended cleomenes, and wondred at his valiantnes; but otherwise to follow him, or to further his enterprife, not a man of them had any hart in them. Thus running vp and downe the towne, they met with Ptolomy (the same whome we sayde before was the some of Chrysermus) as he came out of the Court: Whereuppon three of them fetting on him, flue him prefently. There was also another Ptolomy that was governor and Lieuetenant of the citie of ALEXANDRIA; who hearing a rumor of this sturre, came vnto them in his coche. They went and met him, and first hauing driven away his garde and fouldiers that went before him, they pluckt him out of his coche, and flue him also. After that they went towards the castell, with intent to set all the prifoners there at libertie to take their part. Howbeit the gaylers that kept them had so strongly locked up the prison dores, that Cleomenes was repulsed, and put by his purpose. Thus wandring vp and downe the citie, no man neither came to joyne with him, nor to refift him, for euery man fled for feare of him. Wherefore at length being weary with going vp and downe, he turned him to his friends, and fayd vnto them: it is no maruell though women commaund such a cowardly people, that slye in this fort from their libertie. Thereuppon he prayed them all to dve like men, and like those that were brought up with him, and that were worthy of the fame of his so noble deedes. Then the first man that made him selfe be slayne, was Hipportal, death of cirowho dved of a wound one of the younge men of his company gaue him with a fword at his menes and his request. should see he were dead, and all the rest also, that then he should kill him selfe last of all. Now they all being layed on the ground, he searched them one after another with the poynt of his fword, to see if there were any of them yet left aliue: and when he had pricked Cleomenes on the heele amongest others, and saw that he did yet knit his browes, he kissed him, & sate downe D by him. Then perceiving that he had yelded up the ghost, imbracing him when he was dead, healfo flue him felfe, and fell vpon him . Thus Cleomenes having raigned king of SPARTA fixteene yeares, being the same manner of man we have described him to be the ended his dayes in this fort as ye heare. Now, his death being presently bruted through the citie, Cratesiclea his mother, though otherwise she had a noble minde, did not with standing a little forget her greatnes, through thextreame forow the felt for the death of her fonne: and fo imbracing Cleome. nes sonnes, the fell to bitter lamentacion. But the eldest of his sonnes, (no man mistrusting any fuch matter) found meanes to getout of her handes, & running vp to the toppe of the house, cast him selfe headlong downe to the ground, that his head was all broken and splitted, yet died not, but was taken vp crying, and angry with them, that they would not fuffer him to dye. E This newes being brought to king Ptolomy, he commaunded they should first slea Cleomenes, and then hange vp his body, and also, that they should put his children, his mother, and all her women wayting on her to death: among the which was Panteas wife, one of the fayrest and curreousest women in her tyme. They had not been elonge maried before, when these mischieues lighted apon them, at what tyme their loue was then in greatest force. Her parents then would not let her depart, and imbarke with her husband, but had locked her vp, and kept her at home by force. Howbeit shortly after she found the meanes to get her a horse, & some money, and stale away in the night, and gallopped towards the hauen of Tænarus, where fin-

And Panteas wife alfo, being a mighty tall woman, girding her clothes to her, tooke vp the flayne bodies one after another, and wrapped them vp in fuch things as the could get, speaking neuer a word nor shewing any signe or token of griefe: and in fine, having prepared her self to dye, and plucked of her attyre her felfe, without fuffering any other to come neare her, or to fee her, but the hangman that was appoynted to stryke of her head. In this forte she dyed as constantly, as the flowtest man living could have done, and had so covered her body, that no man needed after her death to touche her: so carefull was she to her ende, to keepe her honestie, which she had alwayes kept in her life, and in her death was mindefull of her honor, wherewith the decked R her body in her life tyme. TIBERIVS

CAIVS GRACCHI AND TIBERIVS

OW that we have declared vnto you the historie of the lives of these two GRE CIANS, Agis, and Cleomenes aforefayd: we must also write the historie of two ROMANES, the which is no lesse lamentable for the troubles and calamities that chaunced vnto Tiberius and Caises, both of them the sonnes of Tiberius Gracchus. He having bene twife Con- The worthiful, and once Cenfor, and having had the honor of two triumphs: had nes of Tiberlnotwithstanding more honor and fame onely for his valiantnes, for the father the which he was thought worthy to marye with Cornelia, the daugh- Tiberius ter of Scipio, who ouercame Hanniball after the deathe of his father: Gracenus the though while he lived he was never his friend, but rather his enemy. It is reported, that Tibe- Cornelia, the !

Briss on a tyme found two fnakes in his bed, and that the Soothfayers and wyfards having confidered the fignification thereof, did forbid him to kill them both, and also to let them both efcape, but one onely: affuring him that if he killed the male, he should not live long after: and if he killed the female, that then his wife Cornelia shoulde dye. Tiberius then louing his wife The sender dearely, thinking it meeter for him also, that he being the elder of both, and she yet a younge rise to his woman, should dye before her: he flue the male, and let the female escape, howbeit he dyed wife cornelia. foone after, leaving twelve children alive, all of them begotten of Cornelia . Cornelia after the The mail of death of her husband, taking vpon her the rule of her house and children, led such a chast life, cornellanowas fo good to her children, and of fo noble a minde: that every man thought Tiberius a wife ther of the man for that he dyed, and left her behind him. She remayning widow, king Ptolomy made fute Cynto her and would haue made her his wife and Queene. But the refused, and in her widowehed loft all her children, but one Daughter, (whome she bestowed vpon the younger Scipio African) and Tiberius, and Caius, whose lives we presently write. Those she so carefully brought vp, that they being become more civill, and better conditioned, then any other ROMANES in their time: every man judged, that education prevailed more in them, then nature. For, as in the fauors and pictures of Castor and Pollux, there is a certaine difference discerned, whereby a man may know that the one was made for wrestling, and the other for running: euen so betwene these two young brethren, amongest other the great likenes betwene them, being both happely borne to be valiant, to be temperate, to be liberall, to be learned, and to be nobly minded, there grew notwithstanding great difference in their actions and doings in the common

Armedefair wealth: the which I thinke contenient to declare, before I proceede any farther. First of all, A the strain for the fauor of the face, the looke and mouing of the bodye, Tiberius was much more milde and tractable, and Casses more hotte and earnest. For the first in his orations was very modest and kept his place: and the other of all the ROMANES was the first, that in his oration ietted vo and downe the pulpit, and that plucked his gowne ouer his showlders: as they write of clee ATHENIAN, that he was the first of all Orators that opened his gowne, and clapped his hand on his thighe in his oration. Furthermore, Caim wordes, and the vehemencie of his perswafion, were terrible and full of paffion: but Tiberius wordes in contrary manner, were mild, and moued men more to compassion, beeing very propper, and excellently applyed, where Caine wordes were full of finenes and curiofitie. The like difference also was between them in their fare and dyet. For Tiberius alwayes kept a convenient ordinarie: and Caius also in respect of R other ROMANES, lived very temperately, but in respect of his brothers fare, curiously and fuperfluously. Insomuch as Drusse on a tyme reproued him, bicause he had bought certayne Dolphyns of filuer, to the value of a thowfand two hundred and fiftie Drachmas for every pownd waight. And now, as touching the manners and naturall disposition of them both a greeing with the diversitie of their tongues, the one being milde and plausible, and the other hotte and chollerike: infomuch that otherwhile forgetting him felfe in his oration, against his will he would be very earnest, and strayne his voice beyond his compasse, and so with great vncomelines confound his wordes. Yet finding his owne fault, he deuised this remedye. He had a feruaunt called Licinius, a good wife man, who with an instrument of Musicke he had. by the which they teache men to ryse and fall in their tunes, when he was in his oration, he c euer stoode behinde him: and when he perceyued that his Maisters voyce was a litle too lowde, and that through choller he exceeded his ordinary speache: he played a softe stoppe behinde him, at the founde whereof Caise immediatly fell from his extreamitie, and eafile came to him selfe agayne. And here was the diuersitie betweene them. Otherwise, for their hardines against their enemies, the instice vnto their tennaunts, the care and paynes in their offices of charge, and also their continencie against voluptuousnes: in all these they were both alike. For age, Tiberius was elder by nyne yeares, by reason whereof their seneral authoritie and doings in the common wealth fell out at fundry times. And this was one of the chiefest causes why their doings prospered not, bicause they had not both authoritie in one felfe time, nether could they joyne their power together: the which if it had mette at one p selse time, had bene of great force, & peraduenture inuincible. Wherefore we must write perticularly of them both, but first of all we must begin with the elder. He, when he came to mans ftate, had fuch a name and estimacion, that immediatly they made him fellow, in the colledge of the Priests, which at Rome are called Augures: (being those that have the charge to consider of fignes and predictions of things to come) more for his valiantnes, then for nobility. The fame doth Appin Clodin witnesse vnto vs, one that hath bene both Conful and Cenfor, & also President of the Senate, and of greater authoritie then any man in his time. This Appin at a fupper when all the Augures were together, after he had faluted Tiberius, & made very much of him, he offered him his daughter in mariage. Tiberius was very glad of the offer, and therewithall the mariage was presently concluded between them. Thereuppon Appius comming E home to his house, at the threshold of his dore he called a lowd for his wife, and told her. Astistia. I have bestowed our Daughter Clodia. She wondring at it, o goddes favd the, and what needed all this hafte? what couldest thou have done more, if thou haddest gotten her Tiberisus Gracehus for her husband ? I know that some refer this historie vnto Tiberius, father of these two men we write of and vnto Scipio the A FRI CAN: but the most part of writers agree with that we write at this present. And Polybius him selfe also writeth, that after the death of Scipio A FRICAN, his friendes beeing met together, they chose Tiberius before all the other younge men of the citie, to marye him vnto Cornelia, being free, and vnpromifed, or bestowed apon any man by her father. Now Tiberius the yonger being in the warres in Africke vnder Scipio the second, who had maryed his sister: lying in his tent with him, he found his Captaine indued with many noble giftes of nature, to allure mens harts to defire to follow his valiantnes.

So in a short tyme he did excell all the younge men of his tyme, as well in obedience, as in the valiantnes of his person: insomuch that he was the first man that scaled the walles of the enesies, as Family reporteth, who fayeth that he fealed the walles with him, and did helpe him in that valiant enterprise. So that being present, all the campe were in loue with him: & when menat valiant enterprise. So that being present, all the campe were in lone with him: & when Tiberius he was absent, enterprise man wished for him againe. After this warre was ended, he was chosen Gratchia cho Treasorer, and it was his chaunce to goe against the NVM ANTINES, with Caine Mancinus one sen Questor. of the Confuls, who was an honest man, but yet had the worst lucke of any Captaine the Ro-MANES had. Notwithstanding, Tiberius wisedome and valiantnes, in this extreame ill lucke of his Captaine did not onely appeare with great glorye to him, but also most wonderfull; the sreat obedience and reuerence he bare vnto his Captaine: though his misfortunes did fo mouble and grieue him, that he could not tell him felfe, whether he was Captaine or not. For when he was ouerthrowen in great foughten fieldes, he departed in the night, and left his campe. The NYMANTINES hearing of it, first tooke his campe, and then ranne after them that fled, and fetting vpon the rereward, flue them, and enuyronned all his armye. So that they were driven into straight and narrowe places, where out they could by no meanes escape. Thereuppon Maneinus dispayring that he could get out by force, he sent a Herauld to the enemyes to treate of peace. The NVMANTINES made auniwer, that they would truft no man but Tiberius onely, and therefore they willed he should bee sent vnto them. They defired that, partly for the love they bare vnto the vertues of the younge man, bicause there was no talke of any other in all this warre but of him: and partly also, as remembring his father Tiberius, who making warres in Spayne, and having there subdued many nations, he graunted the NVMANTINES peace, the which he caused the Romanes afterwardes to confirme and ratifie. Hereuppon Tiberius was fent to speake with them, and partly obteying Tiberius that he defired, and partly also graunting them that they required : he concluded peace with cindeth peace them , whereby affuredly he faued the lines of twenty thowfande Romane Citizens , befides with the North flaues and other stragglers that willingly followed the campe. This notwithstanding, the Nv- mantines. MANTINES tooke the spoyle of all the goods they founde in the ROMANES campe, amonge the which they founde Tiberius bookes of accompt touching the money disbursed of the treasure in his charge. Tiberius beeing maruailous desirous to haue his bookes agayne, returned backe to Nymant is with two or three of his friendes onely, though the armye of the ROMANES were gone farre on their waye. So comming to the towne, he spake vnto the gouernors of the citie, and prayed them to redeliuer him his bookes of accompt, bicause his malicious enemies should not acouse him, calling him to accompt for his doings. The N v-MANTINES were very glad of this good happe, and prayed them to come into the towne. He flanding still in doubt with him selfe what to doe, whether he should goe into the towne or not: the gouernors of the citie came to him, and taking him by the hande, prayed he would thinke they were not his enemies, but good friendes, and that he would trust them. Whereuppon Tiberius thought best to yeelde to their perswasion, beeing desirous also to have his bookes agayne, and the rather, for feare of offending the NVMANTINES, if he shoulde haue denyed and mistrusted them. When he was brought into the citie, they prouided his dynner, and were very earnest with him, intreating him to dyne with them. Then they gaue him his bookes againe, and offered him moreouer to take what he woulde of all the spoyles they had gotten in the campe of the ROMANES. Howebeit of all that he woulde take nothing but frankensence, which he vsed, when he did any sacrifice for his contry: and then taking his leaue of them, with thankes he returned. When he was returned to Rome, all this peace concluded was veterly misliked, as dishonorable to the maiestie of the Empire of Rome. Yet the parents and friendes of them that had ferued in this warre, making the greatest part of the people: they gathered about Tiberius, faying that what faultes were committed in this feruice, they were to impute it vnto the Conful Mancinus, and not vnto Tiberius, who had faued fuch a number of ROMANES liues. Notwithstanding, they that were offended with this Thepeace dishonorable peace, would that therein they should follow the example of their forefathers broken with in the like case. For they sent backe their Captaines naked unto their enemies, bicause they iner. were contented the Samnits should spoyle them of that they had to escape with life. Moreouer, they did not onely fend them the Captaines and Confuls, but all those also that bare any periurie and breache of peace apon them. Herein therefore did manifeltly appeare, the lone and good will the people did beare vnto Tiberius . For they gaue order, that the Conful Man cinus should be fent naked, and bound vnto the NVMANTINES, and for Tiberius sake, they pardoned all the rest. I thinke Scipio who bare great sway at that time in Rome, and was a man of greatest accomptedid helpe him at that pinche: who notwithstanding was ill thought of bicause he did not also save the Conful Mancinus, and confirme the peace concluded with the NUMANTINES, considering it was made by Tiberius his friend & kinfman. But these mislikings grew chiefly through the ambition of Tiberius friendes, & certein learned men, which stimed him vp against Scipio. But yet it fell not out to open malice between them, neither followed there any hurte apon it. And furely I am perswaded, that Tiberius had not fallen into those a troubles he did afterwards, if Scipio A FRIC AN had bene prefent, when he passed those thinges he preferred. But Scipio was then in warres at the seege of NVMANTIA, when Tibering apon this occasion passed these lawes. When the Romanes in olde tyme had ouercomenany of rise preferred their neighbours, for raunfom they tooke oftentymes a great deale of their land from them. parte whereof they folde by the cryer, for the benefite of the common wealth, and parte also they referred to their state as demeane, which afterwards was let out to farme for a small rene yearely to the poore Citizens that had no lands. Howbeit the riche men inhaunfed the rents. and so began to thrust out the poore men. Thereuppon was an ordinance made, that no City zen of Rome should have aboue five hundred acres lande. This lawe for a ryme did bridle the conetousness of the riche men, and did ease the poore also that dwelt in the contry, aponthe c farmes they had taken up of the common wealth, and so lived with their owne, or with that their Auncestors had from the beginning. But by proces of time, their riche neighbours, by names of other men, got their farmes ouer their heads, and in the end, the most of them were openly feene in it in their own names. Whereuppon, the poore people being thus turned out of all, went but with faint corage afterwards to the warre, nor cared any more for bringing vp of children: So that in short time, the free men left ITALY, and slaues and barbarous people did replenish it, whom the rich men made to plough those landes, which they had taken from the ROMANES. Caius Lalius, one of Scipioes friends, gaue an attempt to reforme this abuse: but bicause the chiefest of the citie were against him, fearing it would breake out to some vprore, he defifted from his purpose, and therefore he was called Lalius the wife. But Tiberius being D chosen Tribune, he did forthwith preferre the reformation aforesayd, being allured vnto it (as divers writers report) by Diophanes the Orator, and Blossius the Philosopher: of the which, Diophanes was banished from the citie of MITYLENE, and Blossius the ITALIAN from the citie of CVMES, who was scholler and famillier vnto Antipater of TARSVS at ROME, by whome he was honored by certaine workes of Philosophie he dedicated vnto him. And some also do accuse their mother Cornelia, who did twit her sonnes in the teeth, that the ROMANES didyet call her Scipices mother in law, and not the mother of the GRACCHI. Other fay it was Spuring Posthumius, a companion of Tiberius, and one that contended with him in eloquence. For Tiberius returning from the warres, and finding him farre beyond him in fame and reputacion, and well beloued of euery one: he fought to excell him by attempting this noble enterprise, E and of fo great exspectacion. His owne brother Caises in a certaine booke, wrote, that as he went to the warres of NVMANTIA, passing through THYSCAN, he founde the contrye in manner vnhabited: and they that did followe the ploughe, or keepe beaftes, were the moste of them flaues, and barbarous people, comen out of a straunge contrie. Whereuppon ever after it ranne in his minde to bringe this enterprife to paffe, which brought great troublesto their house. But in fine, it was the people onely that moste set his harte affre to couet honor, and that haftened his determinacion: first bringing him to it by bylles sette vppe on every wall, in euery porche, and uppon the tombes, praying him by them to cause the poore Citizens of Rome to have their landes restored, which were belonging to the common wealth. This notwithstanding he him selfe made not the lawe alone of his owne head, but did it by the # Tibrius for counsell and aduise of the chiefest men of Rome, for vertue and estimation: Amonge the preferring the which, Crassia the high Bishoppe was one, and Mutius Scauola the Lawyer, that then was Ranful and Appine Clodin his father in lawe . And truely informeth shar neuer lawe was made with greater fauor, then that which he preferred against for great ministice, and anarice, Lex Agraia. For those that should have bene punished for transgressing the lawe, and should have had the landes taken from them by force, which they vniuftly kept againft the lawe of Rose and that should also have bene amersed for it: he ordeyned that they should be paved by the sommon wealth to the value of the landes, which they held vniuftly, and to should leave them to the moore Citizens againe that had no land, and lacked helpe and reliefe. Now, though the reform mation chablished by this lawe, was done with such great favor: the people norwithstanding were contented, and would forget all that was past, so that they might have no more wrong offred them in time to come. But the rich men, and men of preat possessions haved the law to B their auarice, and for spight and selfwill (which would not leathern yeeld) they were a deadle foode with the Lawyer that had preferred the lawe, and fought by all denife they could be difswade the people from it: telling them that Tiberius brought in this law Agraria agains to difurbe the common wealth, and to make some alteracion in the state. But they prevailed not For Tiberius defending the matter, which of it felfe was good and just, with fuglic loquence as Tiberi might haue iustified an euill cause, was inuincible: and no man was able to argue against him to confute him, when speaking in the behalfe of the poore. Citizens of Romatthe people bed inggathered round about the pulpit for orations) he told them, that the wild bealtes through Ival whad their dennes and caues of abode, and that the men that fought, and were flaine for their contry thad nothing els but ayer and light, & fo were compelled to wander vp & downe C with their wives & children, having no refting place nor house to put their heads in: and that the Captaines do but mocke their fouldiers, when they encorage them in battel to fight valiandy for the graues, the temples, their owne houses, & their predecessors. For faid he, of suche number of poore Citizens as there be, there can not a man of them (hew any auricient house or tombe of their auncestors: bicause the poore men doe go to the warres, & bestaine for the rich mens pleasures and wealth : besides they falsely calthem Lordes of the earth, where they have not a handfull of ground, that is theirs. These & such other like wordes being vetered before all the people with fuch vehemency & trothe, did so moue the common people withall, and put them in such a rage, that there was no adversarye of his able to withstand him. Therefore, leaving to contrary and deny the lawe by argument, the rich men did put all their trust in D Marcus Octavius, colleague and fellow Tribune with Tiberius in office, who was a grave and wife young man, and Tiberius very famillier friend. So that the first time they came to him to bane, did with oppose him against the confirmation of this lawe: he prayed them to holde him excused, bi- flord Tibericause Tiberius was his very friend. But in the ende, being compelled vnto it through the great " lave. number of the riche men that were importunate with him : he did withftande. Tiberius lawe. the which was enoughe to ouerthroweit. For if any one of the Tribunes speake against its though all the other passe with it, he ouerthroweth it: bicause they all can doe nothing a if one of them be against it. Tiberius being very much offended with it, proceeded no further in this first fauorable law, and in a rage preferred an other more gratefull to the common people; as also more extreme against the riche. In that law he ordeyned, that who so ever had any lands E contrary to the auncient lawes of Rome, that he should presently depart from them. But there The modest uppon there fel out cotinual brawles in the pulpit for orations, against Octaning: in the which; contemion be swist Tiberithough they were very earnest and vehement one against another, yet there patied no fowle w and Offewords from them, (how hot focuer they were one with another) that should shame his com, with panion. Whereby it appeareth, that to be well brought vp, breedeth fuch a ftay & knowledge in a man, not onely in things of pleasure to make him regard his credit, both in word & deeder but in passion and anger also, & in their greatest ambition of glory. Thereuppon Tiberius finding that this lawe among others touched Octavius, bicause he enjoyed a great deale of lands that was the common wealthes: he prayed him fecretly to contend no more against him, promiling him to give him of his owne, the value of those lands which he should be driven to for-I fake, although he was not very able to performe it. But when he fawe Offmin would not be perswaded, he then preferred a law, that all Magistrats and Officers should cease their author titie, till the law were either past, or rejected, by voices of the people: & thereuppon he set his own feale upon the dores of the rejumber of Saturne lythere the cofere of the treasure lay, history the treasure them follows during about time, should neither take out of our in any thing the great pennalties to be forfited by the Prators or advaction Magistrat of authority, that (hours breake this order. Hereupponial the Magistrates learing this pennaltie, did leave to exercise their office for electione. But she is the riche menthat were of great linings, chaunged their and parell, and walked very fadly up and downethe market place, and layed fecret wayte to take Tiberian having hyered men to kill him : which canfed Tiberian him felfe, openly before them all to wear without edagger under his longe gowne, properly called in Latine, Dolon, When the day came that this lawe floud be established Tiberise called the people to give their your ces; and elerische men on thother fide, they tooks away the pots by force, wherein the passes of mens vovces were throwen frashat there was like to fall out great four evpon it. For the fit, a Aion of Tiberens was the ftronger fide, by the number of people that were gathered aboughing for that purpose: had it not bene for Manlius & Faluius, both the which had ben Confuls who went vnto him. & befought him with the teares in their cies, & holding up their hands, that he would let the lawe alone. Tiberian thereuppon, forefeeing the infrant daunger of some great mischief, as also for the reuerence he bare vnto two such noble persons, he stayed a litle i & asked them what shey would have him to doe. They made auniwer, that they were not able to counsel himing matter of so great waight, but they praied him not withstanding, he would be contented to referre it to the indgement of the Senate. Thereuppen he graunted them prefendly. But afterwards perceiving that the Senate fate apon it, & had determined nothing, bicause the rich men were of too great authoritiethe entred into another denise that was nether p honest nor meete, which was to deprine Octanias of his Tribuneship, knowing that otherwise he could not possibly come to passes he law. But before he tooke that course, he openly increased him in the face of the people with curteous words, and tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to franch no more against him, 82 to doe the people this pleasure, which required a matter iust & reasonable, & onely requested this smal recompence for the great paines they tooke in feruice abroad for their contry. Of mine denied him plainely. Then faid Tiberius openly that both of them being brethren in one falle place and authoritie, & contrary one to anotherina matter of to great waight, this contencion could not be possibly ended, without civill warre and that he could see no way to remedy it, vales one of them two were deposed from their of fice. Thereuppon he bad Octavian begin first with him, & he would rife from the benche with B a good will, and become a private man, if the people were so contented. Oftanius would doe nothing in it. Tiberius then replyed, that he would be doing with him if he altered nothis mind apon a better breathe and confideracion: and so dismissed the assemblye for that days. The next morning the people being again affembled, Tiberius going up to his feate, attempted agains to perfer de Offenius to leaue of. Infine, finding him still a man ynremoueable. he referred the matter to the voyce of the people, whether they were contented Official should be deposed from his office. Nowe there were fine and thirtie trybes of the people of the which feuenteene of them had already passed their voyces agaynst Octaving, so that their remayned but one trybe more to put him out of his office. Then Tiberius made them staye for proceeding any further, and prayed Off sains agayne, imbracing him before all the people. I with all the intreatye possible: that for felfewill take he would not suffer such an open skame to be done vinto him, as to be put out of his office: neither also to make him the occasion and instrument of so pitifull a deede. They saye that Octavius at this last intreatie was somewhat moved and wonne by his perfuations, and that weeping, he flayed a longe tyme, and made no aunswer. But when he looked apon the riche men that stoode in a great company rogether, he was ashamed (I thinke) to have their ill willes, and rather betooke him selfered the loffe of his office, and to bad Tiberius doe whathe would. Thereuppon he beeing depuis ned by voyces of the people, Tiberius commaunded one of his infranchifed bondinento pull him our of the pulpit for orations: for he yied his infranchifed bondmen in freede of Serves adnes. This made the fight formuch more lamentable, to fee Offanius thus tham efully pluck # away by force. Yea furthermore, the common people would have ronne apon him; but the riche men came to refeue him, and woulde not fuffer him to doe him further hume.

90 Offanise faued him felfe tonning away alone, after he had bene rescued thus from the fury of the people. Moreouer, there was a faithfull feruaunt of Octavius, who stepping before his Maifter to fave him from hurt had his eyes pulled out, against Tiberian minder who ranne to the rescue with all speede when he heard the noyse. After that the lawe Agraria passed for diaifion of landes, and three Commissioners were appoynted to make inquirie and distribution thereof. The Commissioners appoynted were these Tiberius him (elfe : Appius Clodius his fa-Tiberius prether in lawe, and Caius Gracebus his brother: who was not at that tyme in Rome; but in the thame. For when Tiberius demaunded a tent at the charge of the common wealth, when he should goe abroad to make division of these landes, as they vivally graunted vnto others, that many tymes went in farre meaner commissions: they flatly denyed him, and through the procurement of P. Nasica (who being a great landed man in his contry, shewed himselfe in this action his mortall enemie, taking it greeuously to be compelled to depart from his dand) ones lygraunted him nyne of their obuli a day, for his ordinarye allowance. But the people on tho-ther fide were all in an vproce against the riche. Insomuch as one of Tiberias triendes beeing deade vppon the fodaine, vppon whose body beeing deade there appeared very ill fignes: the common people ranne fodainely to his buriall, and cryed out that he was poyfoned. And fo taking uppe the beere whereon his bodie laye uppon their showlders, they were present at the fire of his funeralls, where immediatly appeared certaine fignes to make them fulpect, that in deede there was vehement cause of presumption he was poysoned. For his belly burst, where-more he fayd, that concerning the townes and cities of the kingdome of Attalus, the Senate had nothing to doe to take any order with them, but that the people were to dispose of them, this prouocation very angrily, and Tiberius also comming out, and having affembled the campe with Scipio A PRICAN, at the feege of the citie of NVMANTIAL Thus Tibering very quietly paffed ouer these matters, and no man durst withstand him and furthermore, he substifured in Octavius Blace no man of qualitie, but onely one of his followers, called Mutius. Wherewith the noble men were so fore offended with him, that fearing the more see of his greatnes, they being in the Senare house did what they could possible to doe him despyte and out there issued such aboundance of corrupt humors, that they put out the first fire, and made them fetche another, the which also they could not make to burne, vntil that they were compelled to cary the bodie into some other place, where notwithstanding they had much a doe to make it burne. Tiberius feeing that, to make the common people mutyne the more, he put on mourning apparell, and brought his fonnes before them, and befought the people to be good vnto them and their mother, as one that dispayred of his health and safetie. About that King Analus D tyme dved Attalus, furnamed Philopater, and Eudemus PERGAMENIAN brought his will to people of ROME, in the which he made the people of ROME his heires. Wherefore Tiberius, still to en- Rome his crease the good wil of the common people towards him, preferred a law immediatly, that the him. ready money that came by the inheritaunce of this king shoulde bee distributed among the for denialing poore Citizens, on whose lot it should fall to have any parte of the division of the landes of of Analus the common wealth to furnishe them towardes house, and to set uppe their tillage. Further-and that he him felfe would put it out. That made him againe more hated of the Senate then before, infomuch as there was one Pompey a Senator, that standing vp, savde: that he was next Eneighbour ynto Tiberius, and that by reason of his neighbourhed he knew that Eudemus P = R-GAMENIAN had given him one of king Attalus royall bands, with a purple gowne befides, for a token that he should one day be king of Rome. And Quintus Metellus also reproued him, for that his father being Cenfor, the Romanes having supped in the towne, and repayring every man home to his house, they did put out their torches and lights, bicause men seeing them returne, they should not thinke they tarved too long in companie bancketing: and that in contrary maner, the seditious and needy rabble of the common people did light his sonne home, and accompany him all night long vp and downethe towne. At that tyme there was one Ti- Titu Anniu tus Annius, a man that had no goodnes nor honestie in him, howbeit taken for a great reaso- afunile quener, and for a futtell questioner and aunswerer. He prouoked Tiberius to aunswer him, whe-aussperer of F ther he had not committed a shamefull facte to his companion and brother Tribune, to de- thinger. fame him, that by the lawes of Rome should have bene holy, & vntouched. The people tooke market place. But he finding him felfe farre inferior vnto Tiberius, both in dignitie and elaquence, ranne to his fine futtill questions; to take a man at his worde : and prayed Tiberius bes fore he did proceede to his accufation, that he would first aunswer him to a question he would aske him Tiberius bad him fave what he would. So filence being made, Annius asked him: if thou wouldest defame me, and offer me injurie, and that I called one of thy companions to helpe me, and he should ryse to take my parte, and anger thee: wouldest thou therefore put him out of his office? It is reported that Tiberius was to gravelled with this question, that though he was one of the readiest speakers, and the boldest in his orations of any man; ver at that tyme he held his peace, and had no power to speake, and therefore he presently dismissed the affemblie. Afterwards, vaderstanding that of al the things he did, the deposing of Octaving to from his office was thought (not onely of the nobilitie, but of the common people also) as fowle and wilfull a parte as ever he played, for that thereby he had imbased, and vtterly overthrowen the dignitie of the Tribunes, the which was alwayes had in great veneration until that present tyme: to excuse him selfe therefore, he made an excellent oration to the people, whereby shall appeare vnto you some special poyntes thereof, to discerne the better the force and effect of his eloquence. The Tribuneship layd he, in deede was a holy and facred thing, as The oration perticularly confecrated to the people, and established for their benefit and safetie. Where of Tiberius contrariwife, if the Tribune doe offer the people any wronge, he thereby minisheth their touching the power, and taketh away the meanes from them to declare their wills by voyces, besides that, power and auhe doth also imbase his owne authoritie, leaving to doe the thing for the which his authority of " first was given him. Or otherwise we could not choose but suffer a Tribune, if it pleased him. " to overthrow the Capitoll, or to fet fire on the arfenall: and yet notwithstanding this wicked " part, if it were committed, he should be Tribune of the people still, though a lewde Tribune. "But when he goeth about to take away the authoritie and power of the people, then he is no more a Tribune. Were not this against all reason, thinke you, that a Tribune when he list, may take a Conful, and commit him to prison: and that the people should not withstand the au-thoritie of the Tribune, who gaue him the same, when he would vie his authoritie to the preiudice of the people? for the people are they that doe choose, both Consul and Tribune. Fur-" thermore, the kingly dignitie (bicause in the same is conteyned the absolute authoritie and " power of all other kindes of Magistrates and offices together) is consecrated with very great D " and holy ceremonies, drawing very neare vnto the godhed: and yet the people expulsed king " Tarquin, bicause he vsed his authoritie with crueltie, and for the injurie he offered one man onely, the most auncient rule and gouernment, (by the which the foundacion of Rome was first layed) was veterly abolished. And who is there in all the citie of Rome to be reckoned so holy as the Vestall Nunnes, which have the custodie and keeping of the everlasting fire? and yet if any of these be taken in fornication, the is buried aliue for her offence: for when they are " not holy to the goddes, they lose the libertie they have, in respect of serving the goddes. Even " fo also it is vnmeete, that the Tribune if he offend the people, should for the peoples sake be " reuerenced any more: Seeing that through his owne folly he hath depriued him felfe of that " authoritie they gaue him. And if it be so that he was chosen Tribune by the most parte of the E trybes of the people: then by greater reason is he iustly deprined, that by all the whole trybes together is forfaken and depoted? There is nothing more holy nor inuiolate, then thinges offered vp vnto the goddes: and yet it was neuer seene that any man did forbid the people to take them, to remove and transport them from place to place, as they thought good. Even so, " they may as lawfully transferre the office of the Tribune vnto any other, as any other offring " confectated to the goddes. Furthermore, it is manifest that any Officer or Magistrate may " lawfully depose him selfe: For, it hath bene often seene, that men in office have deprived them " felues, or otherwise haue sued to be discharged. This was the effect of Tiberius purgation. Now his friendes perceiuing the threats the riche and noble men gaue out against him, they wished him for the safetie of his person, to make sute to be Tribune againe the next years. Whereuppon he began to flatter the common people againe afresh, by new lawes which he preferred: by the which he tooke away the time and number of yeares prescribed, when every

TIBERIUS AND CAIVS.

A mizen of Rome was bound to goe to the warres being called, and his name billed. He made itlawfull also for men to appeale from sentence of the Judges vnto the people, and thrust in also amongst the Senators (which then had absolute authoritie to judge among them selues) alike number of the ROMANE Knightes, and by this meanes fought to weaken and imbase the authority of the Senate, increasing also the power of the people, more of malice then any reason, or for any instice or benefit to the common wealth. Furthermore, when it came to the gathering of the voyces of the people for the confirmacion of his new lawes, finding that his enemies were the stronger in the assembly, bicause all the people were not yet come together: he fell a quarrelling with his brethren the Tribunes, alwayes to winne time, and yet in the end brake up the affembly, commaunding them to returne the next morning. There he would be n the first man in the market place apparelled all in blacke, his face beblubbered with teares. & looking heauely upon the matter, praying the people affembled to have compaffion upon him, faying, that he was affrayed leaft his enemies would come in the night, and ouerthrow his house to kill him. Thereupon the people were so moued withall, that many of them came and brought their tentes, and lay about his house to watche it. At the breake of the day, the Valuekie keeper of the chickins, by fignes of the which they doe divine of thinges to come, brought fignes vinto them vnto him, and cast them downe meate before them. None of them would come out of Tibering. the cage but one only, and yet with much a doe, thaking the cage: and when it came out, it would eate no meate, but only lift up her left wing, and put forth her legge, and fo ranne into the cage againe. This figne made Tiberius remember an other he had had before. He had a C maruelous fayer helmet and very riche, which he ware in the warres; under it were crept two fnakes vnwares to any, and layed egges, and hatched them. This made Tiberius wonder the more, bicause of the ill signes of the chickins: notwithstanding, he went out of his house, when he heard that the people were affembled in the Capitoll, but as he went out, he hit his foote fuch a blow against a stone at the thresshold of the dore, that he brake the nayle of his great toe, which fell in fuche a bleeding, that it bled through his shooe. Againe, he had not gone farre, but he faw vpon the toppe of a house on his left hand, a couple of rauens fighting together: and notwithstanding that there past a great number of people by, yet a stone which one of these rauens cast from them, came & fell hard at Tiberius soote. The fall thereof staied the flowtest man he had about him, But Blossus the Philosopher of Cumes that did accopany D him, told him it were a great thame for him, and enough to kill the harts of all his followers: that Tiberius being the sonne of Gracebus, and nephew of Scipio the AFRICAN, and the chiefe man befides of all the peoples fide, for feare of a rauen, should not obey his citizens that called him: and how that his enemies and ill willers would not make a laughing sporte of it, but would plainly tell the people that this was a tricke of a tyran that raigned in dede, and that for pride and disdaine did abuse the peoples good wills. Furthermore, divers messengers came vnto him, and fayd that his frends that were in the Capitoll fent to pray him to make haft for all went well with him. When he came thither, he was honorably received: for the people feeing him comming, cried out for toy to welcome him, and when he was gotten up to his feate, they shewed them selues both carefull and louing towardes him, loooking warely that E none came neere him, but fuch as they knew well. While Mutius beganne againe to call the tribes of the people to geue their voyces, he could not procede according to the accustomed order in the like case, for the great noyse the hindmost people made, thrusting forward, and being driven backe, and one mingling with an other. In the meane time, Flavius Flaccus, one of the Senators, got vp into a place where all the people might fee him, and when he faw that his voyce coulde not be heard of Tiberius, he made a figne with his hande that he had fome matter of great importance to tell him. Tiberius straight bad them make a lane through the prease. So, with much a doe, Flausus came at length vnto him, and tolde him, that the riche Flausus Flausus Flausus rate of the prease of the men in open Senate, when they could not frame the Confull to their wills, determined them felues to come and kill him, having a great number of their frendes, and bondmen armed for against Tibe-F the purpose. Tiberius immediatly declared this conspiracy vnto his frends and followers: who fraight girte their long gownes vnto them, and brake the fergeaunts iauelins which they caried in their handes to make roome among the people, and tooke the tronchions of the fame EEEE iiii to refift those that would set apon them. The people also that stoode furdest of marueled atio. and asked what the matter was. Tiberius by a figure to tell them the daunger he was in, lavel both his hands on his head, bicause they coulde not heare his voyce for the great noyse the made. His enemies feeing the figne he gaue, ranne prefently to the Senate, crying out, that Tiberius required a royall bande or diadeame of the people, and that it was an enident figner bicause they sawe him clappe his handes apon his head. This tale troubled all the companie. Whereupon Naska belought the Conful, chiefe of the Senate, to help the common wealth. and to take away this tyran. The Conful gently aunswered againe, that he would vie no force neither put any citizen to death, but lawfully condemned: as also he would not receive Tibe. riss. nor protect him, if the people by his perswasion or commaundement, should commit as ny acte contrarie to the law, Nalica then rifing in anger, fith the matter is fo, favd he, that the R Confull regardeth not the common wealth: all you then, that will defende the authoritie of the law, follow me. Thereupon he cast the skirt of his gowne ouer his head, & went straight berius Grac. to the Capitoll. They that followed him also tooke their gownes, and wrapt them about their armes, and layed at as many as they might, to make them gene way : and yet very few of the people durst meete with such states as they were to stay them, bicause they were the chiefest men of the citie, but every man flying from them, they fell one on an others necke for haft, They that followed them, had brought from home great leavers & clubbes, and as they went they tooke vp feete of treftles and chaires which the people had ouerthrowen and broken. running away, and hyed them a pace to meete with Tiberiue, striking at them that stoodein their way : fo that in short space they had dispersed all the common people, and many were O flaine flying. Tiberius feeing that, betooke him to his legges to faue him felfe, but as he was flying, one tooke him by the gowne, and stayed him: but he leaving his gowne behinde him. ranne in his coate, and running fell ypon them that were downe before. So, as he was rifing vp againe, the first man that strake him, and that was plainly seene strike him, was one of the Tribunes his brethren, called Publius Satureius: who gave him a great rappe on the head with the foote of a chaire, & the fecond blow he had, was geven him by Lucius Rufus that boafted of it, as if he had done a notable acte. In this tumult, there were flaine aboue three hundred men, and were all killed with staues and stones, and not one man hurt with any iron. This was the first sedition among the citizens of Rome, that fell out with murder, and bloodshed, since the expulsion of the kinges. But for all other former diffentions (which were no trifles) they D were easily pacified, either partie geuing place to other: the Senate for feare of the commoners, and the people for reuerence they bare to the Senate. And it seemeth, that Tiberius him felfe woulde eafely haue yeelded also, if they had proceeded by faire meanes and perswasion. fo they had ment good faith, and would have killed no man: for at that time he had not in all. aboue 3000.men of the people about him. But furely it feemes this conspiracie was executed against him, more for very spite and malice the rich men did beare him, then for any other apparant cause they presupposed against him. For proofe hereof may be alleaged, the barbarous cruelty they yied to his body being dead. For they would not fuffer his owne brother to have his bodie to burie it by night, who made earnest sute vnto them for it: but they threw him amongest the other bodies into the river, and yet this was not the worst. For some of his frends B they banished without forme of law, and others they put to death, which they coulde meete withall. Among the which, they flue Diophanes the Orator, and one Caius Billius, whom they inclosed in a pype among fnakes and serpentes, and put him to death in this forte, Blosius alfo the Philosopher of Cumes, was brought before the Confuls, and examined about this matter: who boldly confessed vnto them, that he did as much as Tiberius commaunded him. When Nasica did aske him, and what if he had commaunded thee to set fire on the Capitoll? He made him aunswere, that Tiberius would neuer haue geuen him any suche commaundement. And when divers others also were still in hand with him about that question : but if he had commaunded thee? I would fure have done it, fayd he: for he would never have commaunded me to have done it, if it had not bene for the commoditie of the people. Thus he scaped at that time, and afterwards fled into A sia vnto Aristonicus, whom missortune hauing ouerthrowen, he slue him selfe. Now, the Senate to pacifie the people at that present time, suffered the people to appoint an other Commissioner for that purchase, in The the place Thereupon Publism Craffus was chosen, being allied vono Tiberius inposinis Brucehas Tiberius brother) had maried his daughter Licinia. Yet Corn line Novos favalta chapitowas nor Coloffe Haughter, Caim maried, but the daughter of Brunn that briumphed for the L ve is a mariant Howbeit the best wryters and authority, agree with that we wryte. But whiteforcer was about the people were marueloully offended with his death, and men might entely perceive prior they looked bur for time and oportunity to be revenged, and did profestly threaten Newsan accuse him. Whereupon the Senate searing some woulde sowards hims denisted a way woon no occasion, to sende him into Asia. For the common deeple did not diffemble the malice they bare him when they met him, but were verie round with him, and galled him wran, and murderer, excommunicate, and wicked man, that had imbrued his brands in the blood of the holy Tribune, and within the most facred temple of all the citie. So in the ende he was infortsed to forfake Rome, though by his office he was bounde to folemnife all the greatest sagnifes Nasica chiefe ces, bicause he was then chiefe Bishoppe of Rome. Thus, trauelling one of his contribution Bishoppe of meane man, and troubled in his minde; he dyed shortly after, nor farire from the citie of Pare GAMY M. Truely it is not greatly to be wondred at, though the people for much hately visces confidering that Scipio the A FRICAN him felfe (whom the people of Roman for infler explos had loued better then any man elfe whatfocuer) was like to have loft all the peoples good sails they bare him, bicause that being at the siege of N v MANTIA, when newes was brought him Of Tiberius death, he rang out this verse of Homer: Motor and the land of the same The Sand war in anniem l'indie de Begint School fen-Such end upon him ener tight, De Dich in fuch doines doth delight Furthermore, being asked in thallembly of the people, by Caine, & Fuhine, what he thought death of Tiof Tiberius death : he aunswered them, that he did not like his doinges. After that the people chur. handled him very churlifhly. & did euer breake of his bration, which they never did before & he him felf also would reuile the people even in the affembly. Now Cabe Gracehue at the fielt; bicause he feared the enemies of his deade brother, or otherwise for that he songhe meanes to make them more hated of the people; he ablented him felle for a time out of the common affembly, and kept at home and meddled nor, as a man contened to line meanely, without bufying him felfe in the common wealth: infomuch as he made men thinke and reporte both, that he did vtterly mislike those matters which his brother had preferred. Howbeithe was then but a young man, and nine yeares younger then his brother Tibersia, who was not thirty yeare old when he was flaine. But in processes time, he made his manners and condition of the cains Graccions (by litle and litle) appeare, who hated floth and curiofitie, and was leaft of all gener into any couetous minde of getting: for he gaue him selfe to be eloquent, as preparing him wites afterwardes to practife in the common wealth. So that it appeared plainely, that when time eame, he would not stand still, and looke on. When one Vetting a frende of his was such the speake, they leaped for ioy to see him: for he had such an eloquent tongue, that all the Orators but yet he was affrayed to come into the pulpit for Orations, and millitest to deale in manters rance. For this cause therfore he was very glad of this voyage, that he might absent him felfe for a time out of Rome: though divers were of opinion, that he was more popular, and defirous of the common peoples good will and fauor, then his brother half bene before han. But indeede he was cleane contrarie: for it appeared that at the first he was drawen rather against his will, then of any speciall defire he had to deale in the common wealth. Cicero the Orator also sayth, that Cains was bent altogether to flie from office in the common wealth, and to line

TIBERIUS AND CAIVS. quietly as a prinat man. But Tiberini(Caim brother)appeared to him in his fleepe, and calling A him by his name. God vnto him: brother, why doest thou prolong time, for thou canting possiblie escape? For we were both predestined to one maner of life and death, for procuring the benefite of the people. Now when Caiss arrived in SARDINIA, he shewed all the proofes that might be in a valliant man, and excelled all the young men of his ago, in hardines against his enemies, in iustice to his inferiors, and in loue & obedience towards the Conful his Captaine: but in temperaturce, sobrietie, and in painfulnes, he excelled all them that were elder then he. The winter by chaunce fell out very sharpe, & full of sickenes in SARDINIA: whereupon the Conful fent vnto the cities to helpe his fouldiers with fome clothes: but the townes fent in poste to Rome, to pray the Senarethey might be discharged of that burden. The Senate found their allegacion reasonable, whereuppon they wrote to the Consul to finde some R other meanes to clothe his people. The Conful coulde make no other shift for them, and so the poore fouldiers in the meane time smarted for it. But Caises Gracebus went him selfe vara the cities and so perswaded them, that they of them selues sent to the Romanes campe such thinges as they lacked. This being caried to Rome, it was thought straight it was a pretie beginning to creepe into the peoples fauor, and in dede it made the Senate also affrayed. In the necke of that, there arrived Ambassadors of A FRICKE at ROME, sent from king Micipla, who told the Senate that the king their maister, for Caise Gracebus fake, had fent their armie come into SARDINIA. The Senators were so offended withall, that they thrust the Ambassadours out of the Senate, and so gaue order that other fouldiers shoulde be sent in their places that were in SARD INIA: and that Orestes should still remaine Consulthere, meaning also to con- C tinue Caius their Treasorer. But when he hearde of it, he straight tooke sea, and returned to ROME in choller. When men faw Cains returned to ROME vilooked for, he was reproued for Sardinia unto it not onely by his enemies, but by the common people also: who thought his returne verie straunge before his Captaine, under whom he was Treasorer. He being accused hereof before the Cenfors, prayed he might be heard. So, aunswering his accusation, he so turned the peoples mindes that heard him, that they all fayd he had open wrong. For he told them, that he had ferued twelve yeares in the warres, where others were enforced to remaine but ten yeres: and that he had continued Treasorer under his Captaine, the space of three yeares, wherethe law gaue him libertie to returne at the end of the years. And that he alone of all men elfethat had bene in the warres, had caried his purse full, and brought it home empty; where others D having dronke the wyne which they caried thither in vessells, had afterwardes brought them home full of gold & filuer. Afterwards they went about to accuse him as accessarie to a con-

spiracie, that was reuealed in the citie of FREGELLES. But having cleared all that suspicion, and being discharged, he presently made sute to be Tribune: wherein he had all the men of qualitie his sworne enemies. On thother side also he had so great fauor of the common people, that there came men out of all partes of ITALIE to be at his election, & that fuch a number of them, as there was no lodging to be had for them all. Furthermore, the field of Mars not being large enough to hold such a multitude of people, there were that gaue their voyces vpon the toppe of houses. Nowe the noble men coulde no otherwise let the people of their will, nor preuent Cains of his hope, but where he thought to be the first Tribune, he was only chus, Tribune pronounced the fourth. But when he was once possest officer, he became immediatly the chiefe man, bicause he was as eloquent as any man of his time. And furthermore, he had a large occasion of calamity offred him: which made him bolde to speake, bewailing the death of his brother. For what matters socuer he spake of, he alwayes fell in talke of that, remembring them what matters had passed: & laying before them the examples of their auncesters: who in olderime had made warre with the PHALISCES, by the meanes of one Genutius Tris bune of the people, vnto whom they had offered injurie: who also did condemne Cains Vetus rise to death, bicause that he onely woulde not geue a Tribune place, comming through the market place. Where these sayd he, that standing before you in sight, have slaine my brother Tiberius with staues, and have dragged his bodie from the mount of the Capitoll, all the citie F ouer, to throw it into the river: and with him also have most cruellie slaine all his frendes they coulde come by, without any lawe on inflice at all. And yet by an auncient custome of long time observed in this citie of Rome, when any man is accused of treason, and that of duery he must appeare at the time appointed him: they doe not with standing in the morning sende a frompet to his house, to summone him to appeare; and moreover the Judges were not wont to condemne him, before this ceremony was performed : fo carefull and respective were our nredecessors, where it touched the life of any ROMANE, Now Caine having first stirred up the people with these perswasions (for he had a maruelous lowde voyce) he preferred two lawes. The first, that he that had once bene put out of office by the people, should never after be Caim Grate-

The feconde, that if any Conful had banished any citizen without lawefull accusation, the fentence and hearing of the matter should perteine to the people.

R The first of these two lawes did plainly defame Ottawiw, whom Tiberius his brother had by the people deposed from the Tribunshippe. The seconde also touched Populant, who being Prætor, had banished his brother Tiberius frendes: whereuppon he stayed not the triall, but willingly exiled him felfe out of ITALIE. And touching the first law. Caise him felfe did afterwards revoke it, declaring vnto the people, that he had faued Octavius at the request of his mother Cornelia. The people were verie glad of it, and confirmed it, honoring her no leffe for Cornelia, mo respect of her sonnes, then also for Seipioes sake her father. For afterwards they cast her image ther of the in braffe. & fet it vp with this infcription: Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi. Many comon matters are found written touching Cornelia his mother, & eloquently pleaded in her behalfe, by people of Eaiss against her adversaries. As when he sayd vnto one of them; how darest thou presume C to speake cuill of Cornelia, that had Tiberius to her sonne? And the other partie also that slandered her, being forely suspected for a Sodomite: and art thou so impudent, sayd he to shew thy face before Cornelia? Haft thou brought foorth children as the hath done? And yet it is wel knowe to all men in Rome, that the being but a woman, hath lived longer without a man. than thou that art a man. Thus were Caius words sharpe & stinging, and many such like are to be gathered out of his wrytinges. Furthermore he made many other lawes afterwardes to in- other lawer crease the peoples authoritie, and to imbase the Senates greatnes.

The first was, for the restoring of the Colonies to Rome, in dividing the landes of the Caim Graccommon wealth vnto the poore citizens that should inhabite there.

The other, that they should apparell the souldiers at the charge of the common wealth, D and that it should not be deducted out of their paye: and also, that no citizen should be billed to ferue in the warres, under seuenteene yeares of age at the least.

An other law was, for their confederats of ITALIE: that through all ITALIE they shoulde have as free voyces in the election of any Magistrate, as the naturall citizens of Rome it

An other touching judgement, whereby he did greatly minish the authority of the Senate. For before, the Senators were onely Judges of all matters, the which made them to be the more honored and feared of the people, and the Romane Knights: and now he loyned three E hundred Romane Knights vnto the other three hundred Senators, and brought it to to passe, that all matters indiciall shoulde be equally indged, among those six hundred men. After he had paffed this law, it is reported he was verie curious in observing all other thinges, but this one thing specially: that where all other Orators speaking to the people turned them towards the pallace where the Senators fate, and to that fide of the market place which is called Comitium: he in contrarie manner when he made his Oration, turned him outwardes towardes the other fide of the market place, and after that kept it constantly, and neuer failed. Thus, by a little turning and altering of his looke only he removed a great matter. For he fo transferred all the gouernment of the common wealth from the Senate, vnto the judgement of the people: to teach the Orators by his example, that in their Orations they should behold the peo-

F ple, not the Senate. Now, the people having not only confirmed the law he made touching Cains Graca the Iudges, but geuen him also full power and authoritie to choose amonge the Romans chus power. Knightes suche Iudges as he liked of: he founde thereby he had absolute power in his owne that they did not fo much mislike Caius doings, as for the defire they had to overthrow him & his great credit with the people. For where Caim preferred but the replenishing of the two cities, and defired to fend the honestest citizens thither: they objected against him, that he did corrupt the common people. On the other fide also they fauored Drusus, who preferred a law that they should replenish twelue Colonies, & should fend to every one of them three thowfande of the poorest citizens. And where they hated Caius for that he had charged the poore ner did please them by disburdening them of that rent & payment, letting the haue the lands scotfree. Furthermore also, where Caius did anger the people, bicause he gaue all the Latines

hands, infomuche as the Senators them selues did aske counsell of him. So did he ever geue A good counsell, and did preferre matters meete for their honor. As amongest others, the laws he made touching certaine wheate that Fabius Viceprætorhad fent out of Spayne: which was a good and honorable acte. He perswaded the Senate that the come might be solde, and fo to fend backe agains the money therof vnto the townes and cities from whence the come came: and therewithall to punish Fabius for that he made the Empire of Rome hatefull and intollerable vnto the prouinces and subjectes of the same. This matter wanne him great love Other lawer of and commendacion of all the provinces subject to ROME. Furthermore, he made lawes for the restoring of the decayed townes, for mending of high wayes, for building of garners for prouision of corne. And to bring all these things to passe, he him selfe tooke apon him the only care and enterprise, being neuer wearied with any paines taken in ordering of so great af. R faires. For, he followed all those thinges so earnestly and effectually, as if he had had but one matter in hand:infomuch that they who most hated and feared him, wondred most to fee his diligence and quicke dispatche in matters. The people also wondred muche to beholde him only, seeing alwaies suche a number of laborers, artificers, Ambassadors, officers, souldiers, and learned men, whom he easely satisfied and dispatched, keping still his estate, and yet vsing great curtesie and civilitie, entertaining every one of them privately: so that he made his accusers to be found lyers, that sayd he was a stately man, and very cruell. Thus he wannethe good will of the common people, being more popular and familiar in his conversation and deedes, then he was otherwise in his Orations. But the greatest paines and care he tooke apon him was, in seeing the high wayes mended, the which he woulde haue as well done, as C profitablie done. For he would cast the cawcies by the lyne in the softest ground in the fields. and then woulde paue them with hard stone, and cast a great deale of grauell vponit, which he caused to be brought thither. When he found any low or waterie places which the rivers had eaten into, he raifed them vp, or else made bridges ouer them, with an euen height equal to either fide of the cawcie: fo that all his worke caried a goodly leauell withall euen by the lyne or plummet, which was a pleasure to beholde it. Furthermore, he deuided these high waves by myles, euery myle conteining eight furlonges, and at euery myles ende he fet vpa stone for a marke. At either end also of these high wayes thus paued, he set certaine stones of convenient height, a prety way a funder, to helpe the travellers by to take their horse backes againe, without any helpe. The people for these things highly praising & extolling him, and D being readie to make shew of their loue and good will to him any maner of way: he told them openly one day in his Oration, that he had a request to make vnto them, the which if it would please them to graunt him, he woulde thinke they did him a maruelous pleasure: and if they denied him also, he cared not muche. Then euerie man thought it was the Consulshippe he ment to aske, and that he woulde fue to be Tribune and Conful together. But when the day came to choose the Consuls, every man looking attentively what he would doe: they marveled when they fawe him come downe the fielde of Mars, and brought Caius Fannius with his frends, to further his fute for the Confulfhippe. Therein he ferued Fanniss turne, for he was presently chosen Consul: and Caim Gracchin was the seconde time chosen Tribune againe, not of his owne fute, but by the good will of the people. Caise perceiuing that the Senators E were his open enemies, and that Fannius the Conful was but a slacke frende vnto him, he began againe to currie fauor with the common people, and to preferre new lawes, fetting forth the lawe of the Colonies, that they should send of the poore citizens to replenishe the cities of TARENTVM and CAPVA, & that they should graunt all the Latines the freedom of Rome. The Senate perceiuing his power grew great, and that in the end he would be fo strong that they coulde not withstande him: they denised a new and straunge way to plucke the peoples good will from him, in graunting them things not altogether very honest. There was one of the Tribunes, a brother in office with Caius, called Linius Drufus, a man noblely borne, and as well brought vp as any other Romane: who for wealth and eloquence was not inferior to the greatest men of estimacion in Rome. The chiefest Senators went vnto him, and perswaded F him to take parte with them against Caises, not to vie any force or violence against the people should whip any souldier of the Latines with rods to the warres, they liked the law, & past it. Linius also in every law he put forth, said in all his orations, that he did it by the counsell of the Linius Dru-Senate, who were very carefull for the profit of the people: and this was all the good he did in the people ahis office vnto the comon wealth. For by his meanes the people were better pleased with the gainst the se-Senate, & where they did before hate all the noble men of the Senate, Livius tooke away that nate. C malice, when the people faw that all that he propounded, was for the preferment & benefit of the common wealth, with the confent & furtheraunce of the Senate. The only thing also that perswaded the people to thinke that Drusus ment vprightly, & that he only respected the profit of the common people was: that he neuer preferred any law for him felfe, or for his owne benefit. For in the restoring of these Colonies which he preferred he alwaies sent other Commissioners, & gaue them the charge of it, and would neuer finger any money him selfe: where Caius tooke apon him the charge & care of all things himselfe, & specially of the greatest matters. Rubrius also an other Tribune, having preferred a law for the reedifying & replenishing of CARTHAGE againe with people, the which Scipio had rafed and destroyed: it was Caius happe to be appointed one of the Commissioners for it. Whereupon he tooke shippe, & failed into D AFRIKE, Drafus in the meane time taking occasion of his absence did as much as might be to feeke the fauor of the common people, and specially by accusing Fuluius, who was one of the best frends Caius had & whom they had also chosen Commissioner with him for the division of these landes among the citizens, whom they sent to replenish these Colonies. This Fuluius Fuluius Comwas a feditious man, & therefore maruelously hated of the Senate, & withall suspected also of missioner with them that tooke parte with the people, that he fecretly practifed to make their confederats of feditions man. ITALIE to rebell. But yet they had no euident proofe of it to instifie it against him, more then that which he himselfe did verifie, bicause he semed to be offended with the peace & quietnes they enjoyed. And this was one of the chiefest causes of Caius ouerthrow, bicause that Fuluius was partely hated for his fake. For when Scipio A FRICAN was found dead one morning in his The death of E houle, without any manifest cause how he should come to his death so sodainly: (fauing that scipio Afrithere appeared certaine blinde markes of stripes on his body that had bene geuen him: as we haue declared at large in his life) the most parte of the suspicion of his death was layed to Fuluius, being his mortall enemy, & bicause the same day they had bene at great wordes together in the pulpit for orations. So was Caius Gracehus also partly suspected for it. Howsoeuer it was, fuch a horrible murder as this of fo famous & worthy a man as any was in Rome, was yet notwithstanding neuer reuenged, neither any inquirie made of it: bicause the common people would not fuffer the accusacion to goe forward, fearing least Caius would be found in fault, if the matter should go forward. But this was a great while before. Now Caius at that time being in A FRICK about the reedifying and replenishing of the city of CARTHAGE againe, the which F he named I vn on in the voice goeth that he had many ill fignes & tokens appeared vnto him. Furthermore, the woulues came and tooke away the market which they had fet downe to limite the bonds of their circuite, & caried him quite away, This notwithstanding, Caises having dispatched all things in the space of three score & ten daies, he returned incontinently to Rome, understanding that Fuluius was oppressed by Drussuand that those matters required his presence. For Lucius Hostilius that was all in all for the nobility. &c man of great credit with the Senate, being the yeare before put by the Confulthippe, by Caine practife, who caused Fannius to be chosen: he had good hope this yere to speede, for the great number of frends that furthered his fute. So that if he could obtaine it, he was fully bent to fer Caiss beside the saddle, & the rather, bicause his estimacion and countenaunce he was wont to haue among the people, began now to decay, for that they were ful of fuch deuises as his were: R bicause there were divers others that preserved the like to please the people withal, & yet with the Senates great good will & fauor. So Caises being returned to Rome, he removed from his house, and where before he dwelt in mount Palatine, he came now to take a house vnder the market place, to shew him selfe therby the lowlier & more popular, bicause many of the meaner forte of people dwelt thereaboutes. Then he purposed to goe forward with the rest of his lawes, & to make the people to establish the, a great number of people repairing to Romeout of all parts for the furtherance thereof. Howbeit the Senate counselled the Conful Familie to make proclamacion, that al those which were no natural Romanes, resident & abiding within the city self of Rome: that they should depart out of Rome. Besides all this, there was a strauge proclamacion made, and neuer seene before: that none of all the frends & confederats of the C

ROMANES, for certaine daies should come into Rome, But Caises on thother side set up bills on enery post, accusing the Conful for making so wicked a proclamació: & further, promised the confederates of Rome to aide them, if they would remaine there against the Consuls proclamacion. But yet he performed it not. For when he saw one of Fannius sergeauts cary a frend of his to prison, he held on his way, & would see nothing, neither did he helpe him: either of likelyhoode bicause he feared his credit with the people, which began to decay, or else bicause he was loth(as he faid)to picke any quarrell with his enemies, which fought it of him. Furthermore, he chaunced to fall at variance with his brethren the Tribunes, about this occasion. Cains Grace The people were to see the pastime of the sword plaiers or fensers at the sharp, within the very market place, and there were divers of the officers that to fee the sport, did set vp scaffoldes D rounde about, to take money for the standing. Cains comaunded them to take them downe again, bicause the poore men might see the sport without any cost. But not a man of the would veeld to it. Wherefore he staid till the night before the pastime should be, & then he tooke all his laborers he had vnder him, & went & ouerthrew the fcaffolds enery one of the: so that the next morning all the market place was clere for the comon people, to see the pastime at their pleasure. For this fact of his, the people thanked him maruelously, & tooke him for a worthic man. Howbeit his brethren the Tribunes were very much offended with him, & tooke him for a bold prefumptuous man. This feemeth to be the chiefe cause why he was put from his third thus repulsed Tribuneship, where he had the most voices of his side:bicause his colleagues, to be reusged of Tribuneship. the part he had plaied the, of malice & spight, made false report of the voices. Howbeit there E is no great troth in this. It is true that he was very angry with this repulse, & it is reported he spake somwhat too prowdly to his enemies, that were mery with the matter, & laughed him to scorne: that they laughed a SARD ONIANS laugh, not knowing how darkely his deedes had wrapt them in. Furthermore, his enemies hauing chosen Opimius Consul, they began immediatly to reuoke divers of Cains lawes: as among the reft, his doings at CARTHAGE for the reedifying of that city, procuring thus all the waies they could to anger him, bicause they might haue iust occasion of anger to kil him. Caius notwithstanding did paciently beare it at the first but afterwards his frends, & specially Fuluius, did encorage him so, that he began againe to gather men to resist the Consul. And it is reported also, that Cornelia his mother did help him in it, secretly hyring a great number of straungers which she sent vnto Rome, as if they had bene F reapers, or haruest men. And this is that she wrote secretly in her letter, vnto her sonne in ciphers. And yet other write to the contrary, that the was very angry he did attept those things.

C men: who having theselves before slaine Tiberius Gracebiu that was Tribune, & within the Capitoll it felfe, & had also cast his body into the river, did now make an honorable show openly in the market place, of the body of a sergeaut Antyllium (who though he were wrogfully slaine, yet had himselfe geuen the the cause that flue him, to do that they did)& all the whole Senate were about the beere to bewaile his death, & to honor the funeralls of a hyerling, to make the people also kill him, that was only left the protector & defender of the people. After this, they An ordinance went againe vnto the Capitoll, & there made a decree, wherby they gaue the Conful Opinious made by the extraordinary power & authority, by absolute power to prouide for the safety of the common gainst c. wealth to preserve the city, & to suppresse the tyrans. This decree being established, the Con-Gracehus. ful presently commaunded the Senators that were present there, to go arme the selues: & ap-D pointed the ROMANE Knights, that the next morning betimes every man should bring two of their men armed with the. Fuluius on the other fide, he prepared his force against them, & affembled the comon people together. Caises also returning from the market place, stayd before the image of his father, & looked earnestly apon it without euer a word speaking, only he burst out a weeping, and fetching a great figh, went his way. This made the people to pitie him that faw him: fo that they talked among them felues, that they were but beafts & cowards at fuch a straight to forfake so worthy a man. Therupon they went to his house, stayed there all night & The people watched before his gate:not as they did that watched with Fuluius, that passed away the night definded c. in guseling and drinking drunke, crying out, and making noyse, Fuluius him selfe being dronke first of all, who both spake and did many thinges farre vnmeete for his calling. For they that E watched Caises on thother fide, were very forowfull, and made no noyfe, euen as in a common calamitie of their contrie, deuifing with them selues what would fall out apon it, waking, and fleeping one after an other by turnes. When the day brake, they with Fuluius did awake him. who flept yet foundly for the wine he dranke ouer night, and they armed them felues with the spoiles of the GAVLES that hong rounde about his house, whom he had ouercome in battell the same yeare he was Consultand with great cries, and thundering threats, they went to take the mount Auentine. But Caise would not arme him felfe, but went out of his house in a long gowne, as if he woulde have gone simply into the market place according to his wonted maner, fauing that he caried a fhort dagger at his girdel vnder his gowne. So as he was going out of his house, his wife stayed him at the dore, and holding him by the one hand, and a litle child F of his in her other hand, the fayd thus vnto him: Alas Caises, thou doeft not now goe as thou The words of wert wont, a Tribune into the market place to speake to the people, neither to preferre any hubande aims

,, happen to thee that is common to all men, I might yet at the least mourne for thy death with 4 honor. But thou goest to put thy selfe into bloodie butchers handes, who most cruelly have " flaine thy brother Tiberius: and yet thou goest, a naked man vnarmed, intending rather to fuffer, then to doe hurt. Befides, thy death can bring no benefit to the common wealth. For the worfer part hath now the upper hand, confidering that sentence passeth by force of sword, Had thy brother bene slaine by his enemies, before the citie of NVMANTIA: yet had they ge-,, uen vs his bodie to haue buried him. But fuch may be my misfortune, that I may prefently go 55 to pray the river or sea to gene me thy bodie, which as thy brothers they have likewise throwen into the same. Alas, what hope or trust is left vs now, in lawes or gods, sithence they have " flaine Tiberius? As Licinia was making this pitiefull mone vnto him, Caius fayer and foftly pulled his hand from her, and left her, geuing her neuer a word, but went on with his frends. B But the reaching after him to take him by the gowne, fell to the ground, and lay flatling there a great while, speaking neuer a word : vntill at length her servaunts tooke her vp in a swoone, and caried her so vnto her brother Crassus. Now Fuluius, by the perswasion of Caius, when all their faction were met: fent his younger fonne (which was a prety fayer boy) with a Heraulds rodde in his hand for his safetie. This boy humbly presenting his duetie, with the teares in his eyes, before the Conful and Senate, offred them peace. The most of them that were present thought verie well of it. But Opimius made aunswere saying, that it became them not to sea so offer peace. mestengers, thinking with fayer wordes to winne the Senate; but it was their duetie to come the selues in persons, like subjects & offendors to make their triall, & so to craue pardon, & to feeke to pacifie the wrath of the Senate. Then he commaunded the boy he should not returne C againe to them, but with this condicion he had prescribed. Caim (as it is reported) was ready to go and cleare him selfe vnto the Senate: but the residue would not suffer him to go. Wheruppon Fulnius fent his sonne backe againe vnto them, to speake for them as he had done before. But Opmiss that was desirous to fight, caused the boy to be taken, and committed him in fafe custodie, & then went presently against Fuluius with a great number of sootemen well armed, & of CRET ANARCHERS besides: who with their arrowes did more trouble & hurt their enemies, then with any thing else, that within a while they all began to flie. Fuluiss on the other side sled into an old hottehouse that no body made reckoning of, and there being sound Thortly after, they flue him, and his eldest fonne. Now for Caise, he fought not at all, but being mad with him felfe, and grieued to fee fuch bloodshed: he got him into the temple of Diana, D where he would haue killed him felfe, had not his very good frends Pomponius and Licinius faued him. For both they being with him at that time, tooke his fword from him, and counselled him to flie. It is reported that then he fell downe on his knees, and holding vp both his hands vnto the goddesse, he besought her that the people might neuer come out of bondage, to be reuenged of this their ingratitude & treason. For the common people (or the most parte of them) plainly turned their coats, when they heard proclamacion made, that all men had pardon graunted them, that woulde returne. So Caim fled apon it, and his enemies followed him so neere, that they ouertooke him apon the wodden bridge, where two of his frends that were with him stayed, to desende him against his followers, and bad him in the meane time make shift for him selfe, whilest they sought with them apon the bridge: and so they did, and E kept them that not a man got the bridge of them, vntill they were both flaine. Nowethere was none that fled with Caises, but one of his men called Philogrates: notwithstanding, euerie man did still encorage and counsell him, as they do men to winne a game, but no man would helpe him, nor offer him any horfe, though he often required it, bicause he sawe his enemies so neere vnto him. This notwithstanding, by their defence that were slaine apon the bridge, he got ground on them fo, that he had leafure to crepe into a litle groue of wodde which was confectated to the furies. There his servaunt Philocrates flue him, and then slue him selse also, and fell dead vpon him. Other write notwithstanding, that both the maister & seruaunt were ouertaken, and taken aliue : and that his feruaunt did fo straight imbrace his maister that none of the enemies could strike him for all the blowes they gaue, before he was slaine him felse, So F. one of the murderers strake of Cains Gracehus head to carie to the Consul. How beit one of Opimius frendes called Septimuleius, tooke the head from the other by the way, bicause procla-

A macion was made before they fought by trompet that who locuer brought the heades of Fulaim and Caim, they should be payed the weight of them in gold Wherefore this Septimuleius caried Caim head vpon the toppe of his speare vnto Opimine : whereuppon the skales being brought to wey it, it was found that it weyed feuenteene pounde weight and two third partes of a pound, bicaufe Septimuleius besides the horrible murder he had committed, had also holpen it with this villanie, that he had taken out his braine, and in lie withereof had filled his scull with lead. Now the other also that brought Fuluius head, bicause they were poore men, they had nothing. The bodies of thefe two men, Caius Gracehus and Puluius, and of other their followers (which were to the number of three thowfand that were flaine) were all throwen into the river, their goods confilcate, and their widowes forbidden to mourne for their death. Fur-B thermore, they tooke from Lieinia Caius wife, her joynter; but yet they delt more cruelly and heaftly with the young boy, Fulains sonne : who had neither lift up his hand against them, nor was in the fight among them, but only came to the to make peace before they fought, whom they kept as prisoner, and after the battell ended, they put him to death. But yet that which most of all other grieued the people, was the temple of concorde, the which Opimius caused The semple of to be built: for it appeared that he boasted, and in maner triumphed, that he had slaine so many citizens of Rome. And therefore there were that in the night wrote vnder the inscription she confut. of the temple these verses:

A furious fact and full of beastly shame: This temple built: that beareth concordes name.

This Opimius was the first man at Rome, that being Conful, vourged the absolute power of Opimius the the Dictator: and that without law or inflice condemned three thewfand citizens of Rome, first conful, besides Fuluius Flaceus, (who had also bene Consul, and had received the honor of triumphe) furping the and Caius Gracchus a young man in like case, who in vertue & reputacion excelled all the men Distant. of his yeares. This notwithstanding, coulde not keepe Opimius from theuerie and extorcion.

For when he was fent Ambassador vnto Ingurthe king of Nvm 1D 1A, he was bribed with mo- Opinius bitney: & therupon being accused, he was most shamefully conuicted, and condemned. Wherefore he ended his dayes with this reproch and infamy, hated, and mocked of all the people: bis gurthe, and cause at the time of the ouerthrow he delt beastly with them that fought for his quarrell. But the Greech shortly after, it appeared to the world, how much they lamented the losse of the two brethren D of the Gracehi. For they made images and flatues of them, and caused them to be set vpin any sufficient open and honorable place, consecrating the places where they had bene slaine: and many of of the people.

Their mother Cornelia, as writers report, did beare this calamity with a noble hart: and as for The magna the chappells which they built & confecrated vnto them in the place where they were flaine, nimity of Cornelin, the mothe faid no more, but that they had fuch graues, as they had deferued. Afterwardes the dwelt ther of the continually by the mount of Mifene, and neuer chaunged her manner of life. She had many Gratchi. frends; and bicause she was a noble Ladie, and loued ever to welcome straungers, she kept a very good house, and therefore had alwayes great repaire vnto her, of GRECIANS & learned E men: besides, there was no king nor Prince, but both received giftes from her, and sent her againe. They that frequented her copany, delighted maruelously to heare her report the dedes and maner of her fathers life, Scipio A FRICAN: but yet they wondred more, to heare her tell the actes and death of her two fonnes, Tiberius and Caius Gracehi, without sheading teare, or making any thew of lamentacion or griefe, no more then if the had told an history vnto them that had requested her. Infomuch some writers report, that age, or her great misfortunes, had ouercomen and taken her reason and sence from her, to feele any sorowe. But in deede they were fenseleffe to say so, not vnderstandinge, howe that to be noblie borne, and vertuouslie The price of

Ow that we be come to the end of this hiftory, we are to compare the A liues of these two men the one with the other. First, as touching the two Gracchi: their enemies that most hated them, and spake the worst they could of them, could not deny but that they were the best genen to vertue, and as well taught and brought up, as any Romans that were in their time. But yet it appeareth, that nature had the vpper hand of them, in Agis and Cleomenes. For they having bene very ill brought vp, both for learning and good manners, for lacke whereof the oldest men were almost spoyled: yet did they notwithstandinge make them selues the first maisters and example of sobrietie, temperaunce, and simplicities life. Furthermore, the two first having lived in that time, when Rome storished most in ho-B not and vertuous defires: they were more then ashamed to forsake the vertues inherited from their auncesters. These two last also being borne of fathers that had a cleane contrarie dispoficion, and finding their contrie altogether without any order, and infected with diffolute life: were not therefore any whitthe more moued with defire to do well. Furthermore, the greatest praise they gaue vnto the two Gracehi, was, their abstinence and integritie from taking of money all the time they were in office, and delt in matters of state, euer keeping their handes cleane, and tooke not a pennie wrongfully from any man. Where Agu on thother fide was offended if any man praised him, for that he tooke nothing from an other man: seeing that he dispossessed him selse of his owne goods, and gaue it to his citizens, which amounted in readie coyne to the value of fix hundred talents. Whereby men may eafely iudge, how grieuous C a finne he thought it to take any thing wrongfully from any man: feeing that he thought it a kinde of auarice, lawfully to be richer then others. Furthermore, there was maruelous great difference in their alteracions, and renuing of the flate, which they did both preferre. For the actes of the two Romanes were to mend high wayes, and to reedifie and replenish decayed townes: and the worthiest acte Tiberius did, was the lawe Agraria, which he brought in for dividing of the lands of the common wealth amongeft the poore Citizens. And the belt and his brother Caimallo did, was the mingling of the Ludges: adding to the three hundred Sonaporsithree hundred Romans knightes to be indifferent ludges with them. Whereas Agicand Chamenes in contrary manner were of opinion that to reforme final faults, & to redieffe thents hy litle and litle, was (as Rlate fayd) to cur of one of the Hydraes heards of the which came afterwards feuen in the place; and therefore they tooke aponthem a change and innovation. enen at once to roote out all the mischiefs of their contry, (or to speake more truely, to take a way the diforder which brought in all vice and mischief to the common wealth) and so to reflore the citie of Sparta agains to her former auncient honorable estate. Nowe this may be faid againe, for the gouernment of the GRACCHI: that the chiefest men of Rome were ever against their purposes. Where, in that that Agis attempted, and Chemenes ended, they had the noblest ground that could be, & that was the auncient lawes and ordinances of Sparta, touching temperance and equalitie; the first instituted in old time by Lyeurgus, the other confirmed by Apollo. Furthermore, by the alteracions of the first, Roundbecame no greater then it The Affect of was before. Where, by that which Cleomenes did, all GRECE in Chort time fawe that Spart a the Gracchi commaunded all the rest of PELOPONNESVS, and sought at that time against those that were did line profit of greatest power in all Gx & c a, for the fignionic thereof. Whereby their onely marke & purpole was, to rid all G a ece from the wartes of the GAYLES and ILLYRIANS, and to reftore it againe to the honest government of the race and lyne of Hereules. Their deathes, me thinkes.

before he could come to it. And for the victories of Cleamenes on thother fide, may be oppo-doe shew great difference of their corages. For the GRACCHI fighting with their owne Cityzens, were flaine flying. Ot the fe two allo. Acia bicaufe he would put never a Carizen to death. The ende of was flayne in manner voluntarily: and Cleamenes receiving injurio floode to his defence, and the Gracchi when he had no oportunitie to doe it he flow dy killed him felfe. And so may it be faid on thother fide, that Agia did neuer any noble acre of a Captaine or fouldier, bicause he was slayne fed the scaling of the walls of CARTHAGE, where Tiberius was the first man that at the assault The deeder of got vp vpon the wall, which was no small exployte; and the peace which he made also at the the Gracehi. feege of Nymantia, whereby he faued twenty thowfand fighting men of the Romanes, the which had no meanes otherwise to saue their lives. And Caine also in the selfe same warre at the feege of NVMANTIA, and afterwards in SARDINIA, did many noble feates of warre: fo that D there is no doubt, but if they had not bene flaine fo foone as they were, they might have bene compared with the excellentest Captaines that ener were in Rome. Again, touching their doings in civill pollicie, it appeareth that Agus delt moreflackly, being abused by Agelilaus: who likewise deceiued the poore Citizens of the diuision of the landes which he had promised them. In fine, for lacke of corage, bicause he was very young, he left the thinges vndone which he had purposed to have performed. On thother side, Cleomenes went too roundly to worke to renew the auncient gouernment of the common wealth againe, by killing the Ephores with too much crueltie, whom he might easily haue wonne, or otherwise by force haue gotten the vpper hande. For it is not the parte of a wife Philition, nor of a good gouernor of a common weale to vie the fword, but in great extreamitie, where there is no other helpe nor remedie: & E there lacked judgement in them both, but worst of all in the one, for injury is euer joyned with crueltie. The GRACCHION thother fide, nether the one nor the other, began to embrew their

F the faults he committed the greatest that ever he did, was when he deposed Octavius his colleague from the Tribuneship, and that he him selfe made sute for the second. knowen to him, and to his great griefe. Where Cleomenes on thother fide, although we should A forget the murder he committed upon the Ephores, yet he fet flaues at libertie, and ruled the kingdom in manner him felfe alone: but yet for manners fake onely he joyned his owne brother with him, which was of the selfe same house. And when he had perswaded Archidamu (who was next heire to the kingdom of the other royall house) to be bold to returne home from MESSENAVINO SPARTA: he suffered him to be slayne, and bicause he did not revenge his death, he did confirme their opinion that thought he was confenting to his death . Lyonous on the other fide, whose example he did counterfeate to followe, bicause he did willingly refigne the kingdom vnto his brothers sonne Charilaus, and being afrayd also, that if the young child should chaunce to miscary, they would suspect him for his death: he exiled him selfeour of his owne contry a long time, trauelling vp and downe, and returned not to Sparta againe. R before Charilaus had gotten a fonne to succeede him in his kingdom. But we can not set another GRECIAN by Lycurgus comparable vnto him. We have declared also that amongest Cleomenes deedes, there were many other greater alteracions then these, and also many other breaches of the lawe. So they that doe condemne the manners of the one and the other, fay, that the two GRECIANS from the beginning had an aspyring minde to be tyrannes, still pra-Etiling warres. Whereas the two Romanes onely, euen by their most mortall enemies, could be blamed for nothing els, but for an extreame ambition, and did confesse that they were too earnest and vehement about their nature, in any strife or contencion they had with their aduersaries, and that they yelded vnto that choller and passion, as vnto ill windes, which brought them to doe those thinges they did in the ende. For what more just or honest intent could C they have had, then the first was: had not the riche men (even through stowtnes and authoritie to ouerthrow the lawes) brought them against their wills into quarrell: the one to saue his life, the other to revenge his brothers death, who was flayne without order, iustice, or the authoritie of any officer? Thus thou maiest thy selfesee the difference, that was between the GRECIANS and ROMANES: and nowe to tell you plainly my opinion of both, I think that Tiberius was the stowtest of the foure, that the younge king Agis offended least, and that for boldnes and corage, Caises came nothing neare Vnto Cleomenes.

Demosthenes.

The GYE that made the litle booke of the praise of Alcibiades, touching the victorie he wanne at the horse rase of the Olympian games, (were it the Poet Euripides as some thinke, or any other) my friende Sossius: fayde, that to make a man happy, he must of necessitie be borne in some famous citie. But to tell you what I thinke hereof, douteles, true happi-nes chiefly confisseth in the vertue and qualities of the minde, being a new confisted matter of no moment, whether a man be borne in a pelting village, or in the minde in a famous citie: no more then it is for one to be borne of a fayer or and manners fowle mother. For it were a madnes to thinke that the litle village of of man, not in applicate or

IVLIDE, being the least part of the Ile of CEO (the whole Iland of it selfe being but a small conny. B thing) and that the Ile of ÆGINA (which is of so smal a length, that a certaine ATHENIAN ON a time made a motion it might be taken away, bicause it was but as a strawe in the fight of the hauen of Piræa) could bring forth famous Poets, and excellent Comediants: and not breede an honest, just, and wise man, and of noble corage. For, as we have reason to thinke that artes and sciences which were first denised and innented to make some thinges necessary for mens vse, or otherwise to winne fame and credit, are drowned, and cast away in litle poore villages: So are we to judge also, that vertue, like a strong and frutefull plant, can take roote, and bringe forth in enery place, where it is graffed in a good nature, and gentle person, that can patiently away with paines. And therefore if we chaunce to offend, and line not as we should: we can not accuse the meanenes of our contry where we were borne, but we must justly accuse our C felues. Surely he that hath taken vpon him to put forth any worke, or to write any historie, in- Expedient for to the which he is to thrust many straunge things vinknowen to his contry, and which are not an Historiaready at his hand to be had, but dispersed abroad in divers places, and are to be gathered out in a famous of divers bookes and authorities: first of all, he must needes remaine in some great and samous sine. citie throughly inhabited, where men doe delight in good and vertuous thinges, bicause there are commonly plenty of all fortes of bookes: and that perufing them, and hearing talke also of many things besides, which other Historiographers peraduenture haue not written of, and which will cary fo much more credit, bicause men that are aliue may presently speake of them as of their owne knowledge, whereby he may make his worke perfect in euery poynt, hauing many and divers necessary things conteyned in it. But I my selfethat dwell in a poore litle Phankers.

towne, and yet doe remayne there willingly least it should become lesse: whilest I was in ITA. A LY, and at Rome, I had no ley fure to fludy and exercise the Latine tongue, as well for the great busines I had then to doe, as also to satisfie them that came to learne Philosophie of me: so that even somewhat too late, and now in my latter time, I began to take my Latine bookes in my hand. And thereby, a straunge thing totell you, but yet true: I learned not, nor vnderstood matters so much by the words, as I came to viderstand the words, by common experience & knowledge I had in things. But furthermore, to knowe howe to pronownce the Latin tongue well, or to speake it readily, or to viderstand the signification, translations, and fine joyning of the simple words one with another, which doe bewtifie & fet forth the tongue: furely I iudge it to be a maruailous pleasant and sweete thing, but withall it requireth a long and laborsome study, meete for those that have better leysure then I have, & that have young yeares on their R backes to follow such pleasure. Therefore, in this present booke, which is the lift of this work. where I haue taken vpon me to compare the liues of noble men one with another: vnderraking to write the liues of Demosthenes and Cicero, we will consider and examine their nature. manners and condicions, by their acts and deedes in the gouernment of the common wealth. not meaning otherwise to conferre their workes and writings of eloquence, nether to define which of them two was sharper or sweeter in his oration. For, as the Poet Ion sayth,

In this behalfe a man may rightly fay, The Dolphynes in their proper foyle doe play.

The which Caciltus litle vnderstanding, being a man very rashe in all his doings, hath vnaduisedly written and set forth in print, a comparison of Demosthenes eloquence, with Ciceroes, C. But if it were an easie matter for every man to know him selfe, then the goddes needed have giuen vs no commaundement, nether could men haue said that it came from heaven. But for my opinio, me thinks fortune euen from the beginning hath framed in maner one felf mowld of Demostheres and Cicero, and hath in their natures facioned many of their qualities one like to the other: as, both of them to be ambitious, both of them to loue the libertie of their control and both of them very feareful in any daunger of warres. And likewise their fortunes seeme to me, to be both much alike. For it is harde to finde two Orators againe, that being so meanely borne as they, have comen to be of so great power and authoritie as they two, nor that have deserved the ill will of kings & noble men so much as they have done, nor that have lost their Daughters, nor that have bene banished their contries, & that have bene restored agains with D honor, and that againe haue fled, and haue bene taken againe, nor that haue ended their lives with the libertie of their cotry. So that it is hard to be judged, whether nature haue made them liker in manners, or fortune in their doings, as if they had both like cunning workemaisters striued one with the other, to whome they should make them best resemble. But first of all we must write of the elder of them two.

Demosthenes the father of this Orator Demosthenes, was as Theopompus writeth, one of the chiefe men of the citie, and they called him Macharopaus, to wete, a maker of sworde blades, bicause he had a great shoppe where he kept a number of slaues to forge them. But touching AEschynes, the Orators report of his mother, who faid that she was the Daughter of one Gelon (that fled from Athens beeing accused of treason) and of a barbarous woman that was her E mother: I am not able to fay whether it be true, or deuised of malice to doe him despite. Howfocuer it was, it is true that his father died, leaving him feuen yeare olde, and left him reasonable wel: for his goods came to little leffe then the value of fifteene talents. Howbeit his gardians did him great wronge: for they stale a great parte of his goods them selues, and did let the restrunne to naught, as having litle care of it, for they would not pay his schoolemaisters their wages. And this was the cause that he did not learne the liberall sciences which are vsually taught vnto honest mens sonnes: and to further that want also, he was but a weakling, & very tender, and therefore his mother would not much let him goe to schoole, nether his masters also durst keepe him too hard to it, bicause he was but a sickly childe at the first, and very weake. And it is reported also, that the surname of Battalus was given him in mockery by o. F ther schooleboyes his companions, bicause of his weaknes of bodye. This Battalus (as divers men doe report) was an effeminate player on the flute, against whom the Poet Antiphanes to

Demosthenes why he was called Baisa lus. A mocke him, deuised a little play. Others also doe write of one Battalius, a dissolute Orator, and that wrote lasciulous verses: and it seemeth that the ATHENIANS at that time did call a cerraine part of mans body vncomely to be named, Battalus. Now for Argas (which furname men Demoffbents) fav was also given him) he was so called, either for his rude and beastly maners, (bicause some why summer Poets doe call a fnake Argus) or els for his maner of speech, which was very vnpleasant to the eare: for Argas is the name of a Poet, that made alwayes bawdy & ill fauored fongs. But hereof enough as Plato faid. Furthermore, the occasion (as it is reported) that moved him to give him selfe to eloquence, was this. Califtratus the Orator was to defend the cause of one Oropus callifratus before the Judges, and every man longed greatly for this daye of pleading, both for the excel- the Oracor. lencie of the Orator, that then bare the bell for eloquence: as for the matter, and his accufati-Bon, which was manifestly knowen to all. Demosthenes hearing his schoolemasters agree together to goe to the hearing of this matter, he prayed his schoolemaster to be so good, as to let him goe with him. His Maister graunted him, and being acquainted with the keepers of the hald ore where this matter was to be pleaded he so intreated them, that they placed his scholler in a very good place, where being fet at his ease, he might both see and heare all that was done, and no man could fee him. Thereuppon, when Demostheres had heard the case pleaded. he was greatly in loue with the honor which the Orator had gotten, when he sawe howe he was wayted vpon home with such a trayne of people after him: but yet he wondred more at the force of his great eloquence, that could fo turne and convey all thinges at his pleafure. Thereuppon he left the studie of all other sciences, and all other exercises of witte and bodye, The samest c which other children are brought vp in : and beganne to labor continually, and to frame him define of \dot{p} is felfe to make orations, with intent one day to be an Orator among the rest. His Maister that legue to raught him Rethoricke was I fews, notwithstanding that I forrates also kept a schoole of Retho-auence. ricke at that time: either bicause that beeing an orphane he was not able to paye the wages 1 [cm., Demothat Isocrates demaunded of his schollers, which was ten Minas: or rather for that he founde maßer of Re-Isam manner of speeche more propper for the vse of the eloquence he desired, bicause it was therike. more finer, & futler. Yet Hermippus writeth notwithstanding, that he had red certayne bookes, having no name of any author, which declared that Demosthenes had bene Platoes scholler, and that by hearing of him, he learned to frame his pronunciation and eloquence. And he writeth also of one Ctelibius, who reporteth that Demosthenes had secretly redde Isocrates workes of Ren thoricke, and also Alcidamus bookes, by meanes of one Callias Syracvsan, and others. Wherefore when he came out of his wardeshippe, he beganne to put his gardians in sute, and to write orations and pleas against them: who in contrary manner did euer vse delayes Demossiblement and excuses, to saue them selves from giving vp any accompt vnto him, of his goods and paindraving or trimony left him, And thus, following this exercise (as Thucydides writeth) it prospered so well penning of with him, that in the ende he obtayned it, but not without great paynes and daunger: and yet rational, with all that he could doe, he could not recouer all that his father left him, by a good deale. So having now gotten fome boldnes, and being yfed also to speake in open presence, and withall, hauing a feeling and delight of the estimation that is wonne by eloquence in pleading: afterwards he attempted to put forward him felfe, and to practife in matters of state. For as there E goeth a tale of one Laomedon an Orchomenian, who having a grieuous paine in the splene, Aremedie for by aduise of the Phisitions was willed to runne long courses to helpe him and that following the paine of their order, he became in the end fo lufty & nymble of body, that afterwards he would needes the Plane. make one to ronne for games, & in deede grew to be the swiftest runner of all men in his time. Euen fo the like chaunced vnto Demosthenes. For at the first, beginning to practise oratorie for recouerie of his goods, and thereby hauing gotten good skill and knowledge how to pleade: he afterwards tooke apon him to speake to the people in affemblies, touching the gouernment of the common wealth, even as if he should have contended for some game of price, & at length did excell all the Orators at that time that got vp into the pulpit for orations: notwithstanding that when he first ventred to speake openly, the people made such a noyse, that Demossibleness F he could feant be heard, and besides they mocked him for his manner of speeche that was so people for his straunge, bicause he vsed so many long consused peryods, and his matter he spake of was so in- long orations. tricate with arguments one apon another, that they were tedious, and made men weary to heare him. And furthermore, he had a very fost voice, an impediment in his tongue, and had A also a short breath, the which made that men could not well viderstand what he ment, for his long periods in his oration were oftentimes interrupted, before he was at the ende of his fentence. So that at length, perceiuing he was thus rejected, he gaue ouer to speake any more before the people, and halfe in dispaire withdrew him selfe into the hauen of Pirza. There Fast nomus the The SSALIAN beeing a very olde man, founde him, and sharpely reproued him, and told him that he did him felfe great wronge, confidering, that having a manner of speeche much like vnto Perioles, he drowned him selfe by his faynt harte, bicause he did not seekethe way to be bolde against the noyse of the common people, and to arme his body to away with the paines and burden of publike orations, but fuffering it to growe feebler, for lacke of vie and practife. Furthermore, being once againe repulsed and whiltledat, as he returned home. R hanging downe his heade for shame, and vtterly discouraged: Satyrus an excellent player of comedies, being his famillier friende, followed him, and went and spake with him. Domosthenes made his complaynt vnto him, that where he had taken more paynes then all the Orators besides, and had almost euen worne him selfe to the bones with studie, yet he coulde by no meanes deuise to please the people: whereas other Orators that did nothing but bybbe all day long, and Maryners that understoode nothing, were quietly heard, and continually occupied the pulpit with orations: and on thother fide that they made no accompt of him . Satrrus then aunswered him, thou sayest true Demosthenes, but care not for this, I will helpe it straight, and take away the cause of all this: so thou wilt but tell me without booke certaine him, that came into his minde. Satyrus repeating them after him, gaue them quite another grace, with fuch a pronunciation, comely gefture, and modest countenance becomming the verses, that Demosthenes thought them cleane chaunged. Whereby perceiving how much the action (to wete, the comely manner and gesture in his oration) doth give grace and comlines in his pleading: he then thought it but a trifle, and almost nothing to speake of, to exercise to pleade well, voles therewithall he doe also study to haue a good pronunciation and gesture.

Thereuppon he built him a celler vnder the ground, the which was whole even in my time,& he would daily goe downe into it, to facion his gesture and pronunciation, and also to exercise his voice, and that with fuch earnest affection, that oftentimes he would be there two or three monethes one after an other, and did shaue his heade of purpose, bicause he durst not goea- D broade in that forte, although his will was good. And yet he tooke his theame and matter to declame apon, and to practife to pleade of the matters he had had in hande before, or els vpon occasion of such talke as he had with them that came to fee him, while he kept his house. For they were no sooner gone from him, but he went downe into his celler, and repeated from the first to the last all matters that had passed between him and his friendes in talke together, and alleaged also both his owne and their aunswers. And if peraduenture he had bene at the hearing of any long matter, he would repeate it by him felfe: and would finely cowche and conuey it into propper sentences, and thus chaunge and alter euery way any matter that he had heard, or talked with others. Thereof came the opinion men had of him, that he had no very with extreame labor. And for proofe hereof, they make this probable reason, That they never quicke capacitie by nature, and that his eloquence was not naturall, but artificially gotten E veries of Euripides, or of Sophocles. Thereuppon Demosthenes presently rehearsed some vnto C

Demofihenes in his cration findieth to pleafe she people.

fawe Demosthenes make any oration on the fuddem, and that oftentymes when he was fette in the affemblie, the people would call him by his name, to fay his opinion touching the matter of counsell then in hand: How beit that he neuer rose vpon their call, vnles he had first studied the matter well he would speake of So that all the other Orators would many times give him a tawnte for it: as Pythess among other, that tawnting him on a tyme, tolde him, his reasons finelled of the lampe. Yea, replyed Demosthenes sharply againe: fo is there great difference, Pytheas, betwixt thy labor and myne by lampelight. And him felfe also speaking to others, did not altogether deny it, but told them plainly, that he did not alwaies write at length all that he would speake, nether did healso offer to speake, before he had made briefes of that he would F speake. He sayd furthermore, that it was a token the man loued the people well, that he would be carefull before what he would fay to them. For this prepratine (9 he) doth shewe that he

doth honor and reuerence them. In contrary manner also, he that passeth not how the people rake his words, it is a plaine token that he despiseth their authoritie, & that he lacketh no good will (if he could) to vie force against them, rather then reason and perswasion. But yet surther to enlarge the proofes, that Demosthenes had no hart to make any oration on the suddein, they doe alleage this reason: that Demades many times rose voon the sodaine to maintevne Demothenes reasons, when the people otherwhile did reject him: and that Demostbenes on thother fide did neuer rife to make Demades words good, which he had spoken in his behalfe. But now might a man aske againe: if Demosthenes was so timerous to speake before the people voon the fodgine: what ment AEschines then to say, that he was maruelous bold in his words. And how chaunceth it, that he rifing upon the sodaine, did presently aunswer the Orator Python B12 ANtine in the field, that was very lufty in speech, (& rough like a vehement running streame) against the Athenians. And how chaunced it that Lamachus Myrrin Etan, hauing made an pration in the praise of Philip and Alexander, kings of MACEDON, in the which he spake all the illhe could of the Thebans, and of the OLYNTHIANS, and when he had red and pronowneed it in the open affembly of the Olympian games. Demosthenes apon the instant rising vp on his feete, declared, as if he had red some historie, & poynted as it were with his finger vnto all the whole affembly, the notable great feruice & worthy deedes the which the CHALCIDIANS had done in former times for the benefit and honor of GRECE, And in contrary maner also, what mischief & inconvenience came by meanes of the flatterers, that altogether gave them felues tocurry fauor with the MACEDONIANS? With these and such like perswasions, Demosthenes Demosthenes made fuch sturre amongest the people, that the Orator Lamachus being affraid of the sodaine serviced Lavprore, did fecretly conuey him felfe out of the affembly. But yet to tell you what I thinke, De-machine in his mosthenes in my opinion factioning him felfe even from the beginning, to followe Pericles steppes and example, he thought that for other qualities he had, they were not so requisite for him, and that he would counterfeate his grauitie and fober countenance, and to be wife, not to speake ouer lightly to every matter at all adventures: Iudging, that by that manner of wifedom he came to be great. And like as he would not let slippe any good occasion to speake, where it might be for his credit: fo would he not likewise ouer rashely hazard his credit and reputacion to the mercy of fortune. And to proue this true, the orations which he made vppon the fodaine without premeditacion before, doe shewe more boldnes and courage, then would be often carried away with choller and furie. Demetrius also fayth, that speaking one daye to the people, he sware a great othe in ryme, as if he had bene possessed with some di-

Another mocked him for too much affecting a figure of Rethoricke called, Antitheton: which is, opposicion, with faying, Sic recepit ficut cepit, (which fignifieth, he tooke it as he found it.) In the vie of our inter-A this figure Demosthenes much pleased him selfe, vales the poet Antiphanes speaketh it of plea- τομβο. fure, deriding the could be gaue the people, not to take the lle of HALONESUS of king Philip, and as of gift: but to receive it as their owne restored. And yet every body did graunt, that Dema- Bary waya des of his owne naturall wit, without arte, was inuincible: and that many times speaking vpon The natural the sodaine, he did etterly ouerthrow Demosthenes long studied reasons. And Aristo, of the He Demostersh of CHIO. hath written Theophrastus judgement of the Orators of that time. Who being asked Orators what maner of Orator he thought Demosthenes: he auswered; worthy of this citie. Then again, Theophrasia how he thought of Demades : about this citie, faid he. The fame Rhilosopher writeth also, that Orders. Polyenetus Sphertian, (one of those that practised at that time in the common wealth) gaue this sentence: that Demosthenes in deede was a great Orator, but Photions tongue had a sharper vnderstanding, bicause in fewe wordes, he comprehended much matter. And to this purpose, Photomealvaderitanding, Dicaule in tewe wordes, ne comprehension that Demostheres him felfe faid also, that as oft as he saw Phoeson get vp into the pulpit, led the axe of they say that Demostheres for orations to speake against him, he was wont to say to his friends: see, the axe of my words oration

And yet it is hard to indge, whether he spake that in respect of his tongue, or rather for the estimacion he had gotten, bicause of his great wisedome: thinking (as in deede it is true) that one word only, the twinckling of an eye, or a nod of his head of such a man (that through his worthines is attained to that credit) hath more force to perswade, then all the fine reasons & deuises of Rethoricke. But now for his bodily desects of nature, Demetrius PHALERIAN WIIteth, that he heard Demosthenes him selfe say, being very olde, that he did helpe them by these defelt of ne meanes. First, touching the stammering of his tongue, which was very fat, and made him that he could not pronounce all fyllables diftinctly he did helpe it by putting of litle pybble flones into his mouth, which he found upon the fands by the rivers fide, & fo pronounced with open mouth the orations he had without booke. And for his smal and soft voice, he made that lowder, by running vp steepe and high hills, vttering euen with full breath some orations or verses a that he had without booke. And further it is reported of him, that he had a great looking glaffe in his house, and euer standing on his feete before it, he would learne and exercise him selfe to pronounce his orations. For proofe hereof it is reported, that there came a man vnto him on a time, and prayed his helpe to defend his cause, and tolde him that one had beaten him; and that Demosthenes sayd agayne vnto him, I doe not beleeue this is true thou tellest me, for surely the other did neuer beate thee. The playntif then thrusting out his voyce alowde, sayde:

what, hath he not bearen me? yes, in deede, o Demosthenes then: I beleeue it now, for I heare the voyce of a man that was beaten in deede. Thus he thought, that the found of the voyce, the pronunciation or gesture in one fort or other, were thinges of force to beleeue or discredit please the common sorte: but the noble men, and men of vnderstanding, found it too bale euery man that had seene them, would have wondred with what honor, reverence, and mo-destie, they spake vnto the people: howbeit that Demosthenes orations (whosoeuer red them) were too artificiall and vehement. And therefore we may eafily judge, that the orations Densefthenes wrote are very seuere and sharpe. This notwithstanding, otherwhile he would give formewhat of Demosthenes late sitting vp a nights, and that he wrote and studied the most part of the night by lampe light: in deede, & Demosthenes, I know it grieues thee to see my lampe burne all night. And therefore, you, my Lords of ATHENS, me thinkes you should not wonder to see such robberies in your citie, considering we have theeues of copper, and the walles of our houses be but of claye. We could tell you of divers others of his like wittie and pleasant aunswers, but these may suffice for this present: and therefore we will proceede to consider that a man fayth. His countenaunce when he pleaded before the people, did maruailously C and gestime and meane, as Demetrius Phalerius fayde, amonge others. And Hermippus writeth, that one milliked of called AEsion, beeing asked of the auncient Orators, and of those of his tyme, aunswered: that the mbilitie.

further of his nature and conditions; by his actes and deedes in the affaires of the common The time of Demofihenes comming to practife in the betwixt De-wealth. Now Demosthenes first beginning when he came to deale in the affaires of the state, was in the time of the warre made with the Phocians, as him felfe reporteth: and as appeareth E further in his orations which he made against Philip: of the which, the last were made after the offerer of the warre was ended, & the first doe touch also some particular doings of the same. He made the oration against Midias, when he was but 32. yeare old, and was of small countenance & reputacion in the common wealth: the want whereof was the chiefest cause (as I thinke) that inmofilenes and duced him to take money for the injury he had done him, & to let his action fall against him. He vvas not of a meeld and gentle mind. But feerce and haftie to revenge by kind. But, knowing that it was no small enterprise, nor that could take effect by a man of so small power & authoritie as him felfe, to ouerthrow a man fo wealthy, so befriended, & so eloquent as Midias: he therfore yelded him felfe vnto those, that did speake & intreate for him Nether F do I think that the three thowsand Drachmas which he received, could have brideled the bitternes of his nature, if otherwise he had seene any hope or likelihood that he could have preA vailed against him. Now at his first coming vnto the common wealth, taking a noble matter in Demositions, had to speak against Philip, for the defence & maintenace of the lawes & liberties of the GR # - . the Macedo-CIANS, wherein he handled him selfso worthely: that in short space he wanne him maruelous miens. fame for his great eloquence and plaine manner of speech. Thereby he was maruelously honored also through all GRECE, and greatly esteemed with the king of PERSIA: and Philip him felf made more accompt of him, then of all the Orators in ATHBNS, & his greatest foes which were most against him, were driven to confesse that they had to doe with a famous man. For, in the orations which AEschines & Hyperides made to accuse him, they write thus of him. And therefore I maruell what Theopompus ment, when he wrote that Demosthenes had a futtell, vnconstant mind, & could not long continue with one kind of men, nor in one mind for matters B offfate. For in contrary maner, in my judgement, he continued conftant still to the end, in one The conflanfelfe maner & order, vnto the which he had betaken him felf at the beginning: & that not on- 90 of Demoly he neuer chaunged all his life time, but to the contrary he lost his life, bicause he would be ded against no chaungeling. For he did not like Demades, who to excuse him self for that he had oft turned Theopompus. coate in matters of gouernment, faid, that he went oftentimes against his own favings as matters fel out:but neuer against the benefit of the common wealth. And Melanopus also, who was Met the ineuer against Callistratus, having his mouth stopped many times with money, he would vp to furel susfin the pullit for orations, & tel the people, that in deede Callifratus, which mainteineth the con- of the fe Oratrary opinion against me, is mine enemy, & yet I yeld ynto him for this time: for, the benefit of

but there convinced him for promiting Philip of MACEDON to burne the arienall of ATHERS: fo by fentence of that court he was condemned, & fuffred for it. He did also accuse the Nume Theorides for many lewed parts committed, & amongst others, for that the taught slaves to deceiue their maisters: & so following the matter against her to death, she was condemned, and executed. It is thought alfo, that he made the oration Apollodorus spake against the Prætor Tie motheus. & proued thereby that he was a detter to the common wealth, & fo a naughty man; & that he wrote those orations also intituled vnto Formio and Stephanus, for the which he was infilv reproued. For Formio pleaded against Apollodorus with the oration which Demosthenes selfe had made for him: which was even alike, as if out of one selfe cutters shoppe, he had solde his enemies swords one to kil another. And for his knowen orations, those which he made against Androtion, Timocrates, and Aristocrates: he caused them to give them vnto others, when he had R not yet delt in matters of state. For in deede when he did put them forth, he was not passing feuen or eight and twenty yeare olde. The oration which he made against Aristogiton, and the other also of libertie, against Ctefippus the sonne of Cabrias, he spake them, as he saith him selfe. (or as others write) openly vnto the people, bicause he intended to mary Chabrias mother. Howbeit he did not, but maried a Samian woma, as Demetrius Magnesius writeth in his booke he made intituled Synonyma, and in that he wrote against AEschines: where he accuseth him that he delt falsely when he was Ambassador. It is not known whether it was euer recited or not, although Idomeners writeth, that there lacked but thirtye voices onely to have quit AFFchines. But in this me thinkes he spake not truely, and doth but conjecture it, by that the one & the other haue fayd in their orations against the crowne, in the which, nether the one nor the C other doe fay precifely, that this acculation proceeded to judgement. But let other that lyft decide this doubt. Now before the warre beganne, it was euident enough, to which parte Demost there's would incline in the common wealth: For the would neuer leave to reprove and withstand Philippes doings. Therefore he being more spoken of in Philippes Court, then any man els, he was fent vnto him the tenth person with nyne others in ambassade . Philippe gaue them all audience one after an other: howbeit he was more carefull and circumfpect to aunfwer Demosthenes oration, then all the reft, But otherwise out of that place, he did not Demofthenes fo much honor, nor gaue him fo good entertainment, as to his other companions. For Philip shewed more kindnes, and gaue better countenance vnto Aschines, and Philocrates, then vnto him. Wherefore when they did highly praise Philip, and favd that he was a well spoken D Prince, a fayer man, and would drinke freely, and be pleafant in company: Demosthenes fmyled at it, and turned all those thinges to the worst, saying, that those qualities were nothing commendable nor meete for a king. For, the first was a qualitie meete for a pleader, the second for a woman, and the third for a sponge. In fine, warres falling out between them, bicause Philip of the one fide could not live in peace, & the Athenians on the other fide were still incenfed & stirred up by Demosthenes daily orations. Whereupon, the ATHENIANS first sent into the Ile of E v B OE A, (the which by meanes of certaine private tyrannes that had taken the townes, became fubicat againe vnto Philip) following a decree Demosthenes had preferred, & so went to expulse the MACEDONIANS againe. After that also he caused them to send ayde vnto the Bi-ZANT INES, & VNto the PERINTHIANS, with whom Philip made warre. For he fo perswaded the E A THE NI ANS, that he made them forget the malice they did beare vnto those two nations, & the faults which either of both the cities had committed against them in the warres touching the rebellion of their consederats: & he caused them to send them ayde, which kept them fro Demofihenes Philips force & power. Furthermore, going afterwards vnto all the great cities of GRECE as Ambaffador, he did fo folicite & perswade them, that he brought them all in manner to be against Philip. So that the army which their tribe should find at their common charge, was fifthe Macedoteene thowfand footemen, all straungers, and two thowfand horsemen, besides the Citizens of enery citie which should also serue in the warres at their charge: and the money leavied for the maintenance of this warre, was very willingly disburfed. Theophrastus writeth, that it was at that tyme their confederats did pray that they would fet downe a certaine summe F of money, what every citie shoulde paye: and that Crobylus an Orator shoulde make aunfwer, that the warre had no certaine maintenance: inferring that the charges of warre was infinite. Now all GRECE being in armes, attending what should happen, and all these people and cities being vnite in one league together, as, the Evrorians, the ATRENIANS, the Co-RINTHIANS, the MEGARIANS, the LEV CADIANS, and the COROXRIETANS the greatest matter Demosthenes had to do, was to perswade the Thes ans also to enter into this league, bicause their contry confined and bordered with ATTICA, belides, their force and power was of great importance for that they caried the fame of all GR Exiat that time for the valliantest fouldiers. But it was no trifling matter to winne the THEBABS, and to make them breake with Philip. who bur lately before had bound them vinto him by manyigreat pleasures which he had done to them, in the warre of the Phocians; befides also that betwike A THENS & THERES, by reafon of vicinitie, there fell out daily quarells and debates, the which wish suery little thing were B foone renued. This notwithstanding, Philippebeing prowde of the victorie he had wonne by the citie of AMPHISSE, when he came and initiaded the contry of Elaria; and was entred into Phocide: the Athenians were then to amaked with it; that no man durft occupie the pulpit for orations, neither could they tell what way to take. Thus the whole affemble standing in a doubt with great filence, Demosthenes onely stept vp, and did agayne give them counfell to feeke to make league and alliance with the THEBANS; and fo did further encourage the people, and put them in good hope, as he was alwayes wont to doe. Then with others he was fent Ambassador vnto Thebes: and Philippe also for his parte, fent Ambassadors vnto the THEBANS, Amyntas and Clearchus, two gentlemen MACERONIA:18, and with them, Daschus, Theffalus, and Thrafydeus, to auniwer and withftande the period afions of the ATHENIAN C. Ambaffadors. Thereuppon the Theban's beganne to adule them selves for the best, and layed permitteners before their eyes the milerable frutes and calamities of warre, their woundes being yet greene force of eloand vncured, which they gotte by the warres of Phocips. Notwithstanding, the great force quence in ned of Demosthenes eloquence (as Theopompus writeth) did so inflame the Thebans courage with with the Adefire of honor, that it trode under their feete all manner of confiderations, and did for ravilhe thenians, and them with the loue and desire of honestie: that they cast at their heeles, all feare of daunger, from Philippe all remembrance of pleasures received, and all reason persuading the contrary. This acte of king of Maan Orator was of fo great force, that Philippe forthwith fent Ambassadors vnto the GRECI- cedam. ANS, to intreate for peace, and all GR ACE was vppe, to see what would become of this sturre. Thus, not onely the Captaines of A THENS obeyed Demosthenes, doing all that he commaun-D ded them: but the gouernors also of THERES, and of all the contry of BOROTIA besides. And the affemblies also of the counsell of Thebes were as well gouerned by him, as the affemblies of ATHENS, being alike beloued both of the one and the other, and having a like authoritie to commaund both, and not vndeseruedly, as Theopompus sayth, but by just desert. But some fatall destinie, and the revolucion of times had determined the finall ende of the libertie of GRECE at that time, cleane contrary to his purpose and intent. There were also many celestiall signes Theouribron that did foreshewe and prognosticate what ende should ensue thereof. And amonge others, and foreshew. VV hat time the bluddy battell shall be fought at Thermodon, God graunt I may be farre avvay or els (to looke theron) Have Egles vvings to fore above, among the clowvdes on hye. For there the vanquisht side shall weepe, and Conquerer shall dye.

Men do report that this Thermodon is a litle river of our contry of CHERONEA; the which Thering of falleth into the river of Cephifus: howbeit at this present time there is never a river nor brook or Hamon, in in all our contry, that I know, called Thermodon. And I thinke, that that river which we call the contry of now Hæmon, was in old time Thermodon: for it runneth by the temple of Hereules, where the Charpenes. GRECIANS lay in campe. And it may be, that bicause it was filled with dead bodies, and that it ranne bloud at the day of the battel, it chaunged her name, & was furnamed Hæmon, bicause ranne bloud at the day of the batter, it chaunged her name, or was humanied the internation, on a daubter opinion of the human in the Greeke tongue, fignifieth bloud. Yet Duris writeth notwithflanding, that this sins of there Thermodon was no river, but that certainemen fetting vp their tent, and trenching it about, medon found a litle image of stone, whereuppon were engrauen these letters, whereby it appeareth that it was a man called Thermodon, who caried an A MAZON hart in his armes, & that for this

There will be fore of carkeffes of men to feede upon. This norwithstanding it is very hard to tell the trothe of these things But Demost benest trusting to the valliantnes and power of the GRECTANS, and being manuelously incoraged to fee fuch a great number of valliant & resolute me, so willing to fight with the enemy he bad them be of good corage, & nor to buffe about such oracles, & to giuceare to those prophecies, And furthermore, he told them plainly, that he did mistrust the Nunne Pythia did leane vnto Philo. as fauoring him, & did put the THEBANS in mind of their Captaine Epaminondas, & the ATHE NIANS Of Pericles & perswaded them, that those two famous men were alwaies of opinionathan fuch prophecies were no other but a fine cloke for cowards, & that taking no heede to them, R they did dispatch their matters according to their owne discretion. Demosthenes word and de-fwaded the people. For he left his ranck, & cowardly cast away his weapons to ronne the lighter, & was not ashamed at all as Pythias said of the words written upon his shield in golden letters, which were, Good Fortune, Now Philip having wonne the battell, he was at that prefent for iovfull, that he fell to commit many fond parts. For after he had droncke well with his friends. he went into the place where the ouerthrow was given, & there in mockery began to fing the beginning of the decree which Demosthenes had preferred, (by the which the ATHENIANS accordingly proclaimed warres against him rising and falling with his voyce, and dauncing it in C measure with his foote:

Demosthenes, the sonne of Demosthenes Paanian did put forth this,

But afterwards beginning to waxe fober, & leaving his dronckennes, & that he had remebred him felfe what daunger he had bene in then his heare stood bolt vpright vpon his head. confidering the force & power of fuch an Orator, that in a peece of a day had inforced him to hazard his Realme & life at a battell. Now Demosthenes fame was so great, that it was caried euen to the great king of Parsians court, who wrote vnto his Lieuetenants & gouernors, that they should feede Demosthenes with money, & should procure to entertaine him about all the men in GRECE, as he that could best withdraw Philip, & trouble him with the warres and mmults of GRECE. And this was afterwards proued by letters found of Demosthenes him felfe, D the which came to king Alexanders hands in the citie of SARDIS, and by other writings also of the gouernors & Lieuetenants of the king of Persia: in the which were named directly the king of Persia expresse sommes of money which had bene sent & given vnto him Now, the GRECIANS be-

mon wealth, began to fet apon him, & to prepare to accuse him. But the people did not onely cleere him of all the accusations objected against him, but did continue to honor him more then before, & to call him to affemblies, as one that loued the honor and benefit of his contry, So that when the bones of their contry men which were flavne at the battell of CHERONEA.

were brought to be openly buried according to the custom: the people gaue him the honor to DemoGhenes praifeth them make the funeral oration in praife of the dead,& made no shew of sorow or griefe for the losse E they had received: (as Theopompus witneffeth, and doth nobly declare) but rather in contrary flaine as the manner shewed that they did not repent them in following of his counsel, but did honor him bassell of Cha ronea. that gaue it, Demosthenes then did make the funerall oration. But afterwards in all the decrees he preferred to the people, he would never subscribe any, to prevent the sinister lucke & misfortune of his name, but did passe it vnder his friends names one after another, vntill he grew The death of Coragious againe, shortly after that he vnderstoode of the death of Philip, who was slaine im-Philip king of mediatly after the victorie he wanne at CHERONEA. And it seemeth this was the meaning of the prophecie or oracle in the two last verses:

The vanquished bevvayles his luckleffe lot, And he that vvinnes, with life escapeth not.

Now Demosthenes hearing of thilips death, before the newes were openly known, to preset them, he would put the people again into a good hope of better lucke to come. Thereupon he wet with a cheerfull coutenace into the affembly of the could the other there, that he had had a certain dreame that promised great good hap, & that out of had vnto the ATHENIANS: &immediatly after the meffengers arrived that brought certain newes of king Philips death.

Thereupon the ATHENIANS made facrifices of joy to the goddes for this happie newes, and appointed a crowne vnto Paufanias that had flaine him. Demosthenes also came abroade in his Demosthenes best gowne, and crowned with slowers, seuen dayes after the death of his daughter, as AE- iny of his conschmes reporteth: who reproueth him for it, and noteth him to be a man having little love or mie, before charitie vnto his owne children. But in deede AEschines selfe deserueth more blame, to haue the some fuch a tender womanish hart, as to beleue, that weeping, and lamenting, are fignes of a gentle daughter.

and charitable nature, condemning them that with pacience and constancie doe passe away AEschinerre R fuch misfortunes. But now to the ATHENIANS againe. I can neither thinke nor fay that they plusary for did wifely to shew such open signes of ioy, as to weare crownes & garlands vpon their heads, his fonde benor also to sacrifice to the goddes for the death of a Prince, that behaned him selfe so Princely and curteously vnto them in the victories he had won of them. For though in dede all cruelty and foroming be subject to the reuenge of the goddes, yet is this an act of a vile and base minde, to honor a are signed of man, and while he lived to make him free of their citie, & now that an other hath flaine him, viie. they to be in such an exceeding iolitic withall, and to exceede the bondes of modestie so farre, as to rampe in maner with both their feete vpon the dead, and to fing fonges of victorie, as if they them selues had bene the men that had valliantly slaine him. In contrarie manner also, I praise and commend the constancie and corage of Demosthenes, that he leaving the teares and ametacion of his home trouble vnto women, did him felfe in the meane time that he thought praifeth pewas for the benefite of the common wealth: and in my opinion, I thinke he did therein like a moffhenes man of corage, and worthy to be a gouernor of a common wealth, neuer to stowpe nor yeeld, constancie, for but alwayes to be found stable and constant, for the benefit of the common wealth, rejecting mourning, to all his troubles, cares, and affections, in respect of the service of his contrie, and to keepe his resource for his honor much more carefully, then common players vie to doe, when they play the partes of common con mich more carefully, then common players vie to doe, when they play the partes of trie benefit. But thus farre I difgressed from my historie, enlarging this matter, bicause AEschines in his Oration touching this matter, did moue the peoples hartes too muche to womanish forow, Demosphenes

But now to the rest. The cities of GR ECE being againe stirred vp by Demosthenes, made a new Gretians league againe together: and the THEBANS also having armed them selves by his practife, did gainst Meoneday fet vpon the garrison of the MACEDONIANS within their city, and flue many of them. E The ATHENIANS prepared also to maintaine warre on the THEBANS behalfe and Demosthenes was dayly at all the affemblies of counfell, in the pulpit, perfwading the people with his Orations: and he wrote also into As IA vnto the king of PERSIAES Lieutenaunts and Captaines, to make warre with Alexander on their fide, calling him child, and Margites, as muche to fav, as foole. But after that Alexander having fer all his things at stay within his realme, came him felfe in person with his armie, and inuaded the contrie of Bonoria: then fell the pride of the ATHENIANS greatly, & Demostheres also plied the pulpit no more as he was wont. At length. the poore Thebans being left vnto them selves, forsaken of euerie man: they were compelled them selues alone to beare the brunte of this warre, & so came their city to vtter ruine and destruction. Thereby the ATHENIANS being in a maruelous feare and perplexitie, did sodain-Fly choose Ambassadors to send vnto this young king, and Demosthenes chiesly among others: who being affrayed of Alexanders furie and wrath, durst not goe to him, but returned from

A required cerlyeuctus, Ephialtes, Lycurgus, Myrocles, Damon, Callifthenes, and Charidemus. At which time. they wryte that Demosthenes told the people of ATHENS, the fable of the sheepe and woulses. how that the wouldes came on a time, and willed the sheepe, if they woulde have peace with them, to deliuer them their mastiues that kept them. And so he compared him selfe, and his companions that trauelled for the benefit of the contrie, vnto the dogges that kepe the flocks of sheepe, and calling Alexander the woulfe. And so forth, sayd he, like as you see these come maisters bringing a sample of their corne in a dish or napkin to shew you, and by that litle doe fell all that they have: fo I thinke you will all wonder, that delivering of vs, you will also deliuer your selues into the handes of your enemies. Aristobulus of Cassandra reporteththis B matter thus. Now the ATHENIAN'S being in consultacion, not knowing how to resolue: Demades having taken five talents of them whom Alexander demaunded, did offer him felfe, and promised to goe in this Ambassade vnto Alexander, and to intreate for them, either bicause he trusted in the loue the king did beare him, or else for that he thought he hoped he shoulde finde him pacified, as a Lyon glutted with the blood of beaftes which he had flaine. Howfoeuer it happened, he perswaded the people to send him vnto him, and so handled Alexander. that he got their pardon, and did reconcile him with the citie of ATHENS. Thereuppon Alexander being revired. Demades and his fellowes bare all the fway and authoritie, and Demosthenes was vnder foote. In deede when Agis king of LACED & MON, came with his armie into the field, he began a litle to rowfe him felfe, and to lift vp his head : but he shrunke choller againe C foone after, bicause the Athenians woulde not rise with the Laced EMONIANS, who were ouerthrowen, and Aeis flaine in battell. At that time was the cause of the crowne pleaded against Cteliphon, and the plea was written a little before the battell of CHERONEA, in the yeare when Charondas was Prouost of ATHENS: howbeit no sentence was given but ten yeres after that Aristophon was Prouost. This was such an open judgement, and so famous, as never was any, as well for the great fame of the Orators that pleaded in emulacion one of the other, as also for the worthines of the Iudges that gaue sentence thereof: who did not leave Demosthe-

Wherefore immediatly after sentence genen, he went out of ATHENS for sname, and trauelled into the contrie of IONIA, and vnto the RHODES, where he did teache Rethoricke. Shortly after, Harpalus flying out of Alexanders feruice, came vnto At HENS, being to be charged with many fowle matters he had committed by his exceeding prodigali-Athems flying tie: and also bicause he feared Alexanders furie, who was growen seuere and cruell, vnto his chiefest servauntes. He comming now amongest the ATHENIANS, with store of gold and siluer, the Orators being greedie and desirous of the golde and siluer he had brought : beganne straight to speake for him, and did counsell the people to receive & protect a poore suter that came to them for fuccour. But Demosthenes gave counsell to the contrarie, and bad them rather drive him out of the citie, and take heede they brought not warres apon their backes, for E a matter that not onely was not necessarie, but furthermore meerely vniust. But within sewe daies after, inventory being taken of all Harpalus goods, he perceiving that Demosthenes tooke great pleafure to fee a cuppe of the kings, and confidered verie curiously the facion & workemanshippe vpon it: he gaue it him in his hand, to judge what it weyed. Demosthenes peasing it, wondered at the great weight of it, it was so heavie: so he asked how many pownd weight it weyed. Harpalus smiling, answered him: it will wey thee twentie talents. So when night was come, he fent him the cuppe, with the twentie talentes. This Harpalus was a verie wife man, and found straight by Demosthenes countenaunce that he loued money, and coulde presently iudge his nature, by feeing his pleasaunt countenaunce, and his eyes still vpon the cuppe. So Demostheres Demostheres refused not his gift, and being ouercomen withall, as if he had received a garribribed by Harpalus with fon into his house, he tooke Harpalus parte. The next morning, he went into the affemblie premy talin. of the poople, having his necke bound vp with wolle and rolles. So when they called him by his name to steppe vp into the pulpit; to speake to the people as he had done beforethe made afigne with his head, that he had an impediment in his voyce, & that he could not speake. But wife men laughing at his fine excuse, tolde him it was no sinanche that had stopped his wefill that night, as he would make them beleue: but it was Harpalus argentlynanche which he had received, that made him in that case. Afterwardes when the people viderstoode that he was corrupted, Demosthenes going about to excuse him selfe, they would not abide to heare him; but made a noyle and exclamacion against him. Thereuppon there rose vp a pleasaunt convnto him. This did pearce his hart the more for forow, that he aunswered them; why, would

Nowe Demosthenes desiring to shewe that he was in fault, preferred a decree, 120720: alluthat the court of the Areopagites should heare the matter, and punish them that were found ding to the faultie, and therewithall straight offered him selfe to be tried. For Alcibiades was called home by force: & he was fent for with the good will of the citizens. This notwish ftanding, he remained still condemned for his fine: for by the law, the people coulde not die spence withall, nor remit it. Howbeit they deuised a way to deceive the lawe: for they had a manner to geue certaine money vnto them that did prepare and fette out the aulter of Inpiter fauior, for the day of the solemnitie of the factifice, the which they did yearely celebrate vnto him: so they gave him the charge to make this preparacion for the summe of fifty talents be- C ing the summe of the fine aforesayd wherin he was condemned. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the good happe of his restitucion to his contry and goodes. For the affaires of the GRE-CIANS were immediatly after brought to vtter ruine. For the battell of Cranon which they loft, was in the moneth Munichyon (to wit, Iulie) and in the moneth Boedromion next enfuing, (to wit, August) the garrison of the MACED ONIANS entred into the force of Munichya. And in the moneth Pyanepsion (to wit, the October following) Demosthenes died in this maner. When newes came to ATHENS, that Antipater and Craterus were comming thither with a great armie, Demosthenes and his frends got out of the towne a little before they entred. the people, by Demades perswasion, having condemned them to dye. So, every man making shift for him selfe, Antipater sent souldiers after them to take them : and of them Archies was D Archias Phy. Captaine, furnamed Phygadotheras, as muche to fay, as a hunter of the banished men. It is rebunter of the ported that this Archies was borne in the citie of Thyries, and that he had bene sometimes

Furthermore, hearing that Demosthenes had taken sanctuarie in the Ile of CALAV-RIA, he tooke litle pinnafies, and a certaine number of THRACIAN fouldiers, & being comen thither, he fought to perswade Demosthenes to be contented to goe with him vnto Antipater, promising him that he should have no hurt. Demosthenes had a straunge dreame the night before, and thought that he had played a tragedic contending with Archias, and that he handled him selfe so well, that all the lookers on at the Theater did commende him, and gaue him the honor to be the best player: howbeit that otherwise, he was not so well surnished, as Archia and his players, and that in all maner of furniture he did farre exceede him. The next morning when Archias came to speake with him, who vsing gentle wordes vnto him, thinking thereby to winne him by fayer meanes to leave the fanctuarie: Demosthenes looking him full in the face, sitting still where he was, without remouing, sayd vnto him: O Archias, thou diddest neuer perswade me when thou playedst a play, neither shalt thou nowe perswade me,

O, favd Demostheres, now thou speakest in good earnest, without diffimulacion, as the Oracle of MACEDON hath commaunded thee: for before, thou spakest in the clowdes, and faire from thy thought. But I pray thee stay a while, till I have written somewhat to my frendes. After he had fayd fo, he went into the temple as though he would have dispatched some letters, and did put the ende of the quill in his mouth which he wrote withall, and bit it as his maner was when he did vie to write any thing, and held the ende of the quill in his mouth a pretie while together: then he cast his gowne ouer his head, and layed him downe. Archias fouldiers seeing that, being at the dore of the temple, laughing him to scorne (thinking he had done so for saturb portion that he was affrayed to dye) called him coward, and beaft. Archias also comming to him; felfs, in the B prayed him to rife, and beganne to vie the former perswassions, to him, promising him that he temple of

Nowe his death being thus fodaine, the THRACIAN fouldiers that were at the temple dore, reported that they fawe him plucke the poyfon which he put into his mouth, out of a little cloth he had, thinking to them that it had bene a pece of gold he had swallowed downe. There are many writers also that do reporte his death diversly, but to recite them all it were in vaine:) fauing that there was one called Demochares (who was Demosthenes verie frende) fayd, that he dyed not so sodainly by poyson, but that it was the speciall fauor of the gods (to preserve him from the crueltie of the MACEDONIANS) that fo fodainly tooke him out of his life, and made him feele fo litle paine. Demosthenes dyed the fixteenth day of the moneth Pynepsion (to wit, The time of the ATHENIANS to honor him according to his defertes, did cast his image in braffe, & made The Athenialawe besides, that the oldest man of his house shoulde for ever be kept within the pallace, and honored at the charge of the common wealth: and ingraued these verses also apon the base of his i- die his

For they that thinke, that it was Demosthenes him felfe that made the versesin the He of CALAVRIA, before he tooke his poyfon: they are greatly deceived. But yet alitle before my first comming to ATHENS, there went a reporte that such a thing happened, A certaine souldier being sent for to come vnto his Captaine, did put such peeces of gold as he had into the handes of Demosthenes statue, which had both his hands iowned together; and there grew hard by it a great plane tree, diners leanes whereof either blowen of by winde by chaunce, or elle put there of purpose by the souldier, couered so this golde, that it was there a long time, and no man found it: vntill fuch time as the fouldier came againe, and found it as he left it. Hereuppon this matter running abroade in euerie mans mouth, there were divers wife men that tooke occasion of this subject, to make epigrammes in the praise of Demosthenes, as one who in his life was neuer corrupted. Furthermore, Demades did not long enjoy the honor he though A he had newly gotten. For the inftice of the goddes, reuenger of the death of Demolthern brought him into MACEDON, to receive just punishment by death, of those whom he diffice neftly flattered: being before growen hatefull to them, and afterwardes committed a faile whereby he coulde not escape. For there were letters of his taken, by the which he did ner fwade, and pray * Perdiesas, to make him felfe king of MACED ON, & to deliuer GRECE from bondage, faying that it hong but by a threde, and yet it was halfe rotten, meaning thereby, Antipater. Dinarchus CORINTHIAN accified him, that he wrote these letters: the which so grieuously offended Cassander, that first he slewe his owne some in his armes, and then commaunded they should afterwards kill Demades, making him feele then by those miseries (which are the cruellest that can happen vnto man) that traitors betraying their owne contrie do first a of all betray them selues. Demosthenes had often forewarned him of his end, but he would neuer beleue him. Thus, my frend Sossius, you have what we can deliver you, by reading, or reporte, touching Demosthenes life and doings.

THE LIFE Marcus Tullius (icero.

Ciceroes pa-

S touching Ciceroes mother, whose name was Helma, it is reported she was a gentlewoman borne, & lived alwayes verie honeftly: but for his father, the reports of him are divers and infinite. For some say that he was borne and brought up in a fullers shoppe: others reporte that he Came of Tullim Atina, who while ne inted was nonoted among the Volsces as king, and made verie sharpe and cruell warres with the ROMANES. But furely it feemes to me, that the first of that name called Cicero, was fome famous man, and that for his fake his offpring continued ftill that furname, and were glad to keepe it, though many men scorned it, bicause Cicer in English signifieth a riche pease. That Cicero had a thing you the tippe of his nofe, as it had bene a litle wart, muche like to a riche peafe, whereupponthey furnamed him Cicero. But this Cicero, whose life we write of nowe, nobly aunswered certains

A of his frendes on a time geuing him counfell to chaunge his name, when he fifft made fire far office and beganne to practife in matters of state : that he woulde enderiour him felfe to make the name of the Ciceroes more noble and famous, then the Seases, or Catalia. After that, Cicero beinge made Treasorer in Sicile, he gaue an offering of certeine filuer ciero Que. plate vnto the goddes, and at large engraved on it his two first names. Marcan Tulling: and for in place of his third name, he pleasauntly commaunded the workeman to cut out the forme and facion of a riche peale. Thus muche they wryte of his name. Nowe for his birth, it Cientus was fayed that his mother was brought a bedde of him without any paine, the thirst daye of birth. Januarie: on which day the Magistrates and Gouernours of Roma doe vie at this present. wearely to make folemne prayers and facrifices vnto the goddes, for the health and profperiice of the Emperour. Further, it is reported, that there appeared an image to his nurle, that In image ap didprognosticate vnto her she gaue a childe sucke, which in time to come shoulde doe great periodic cigood vnto all the ROMANES. Nowe though fuch thinges may feeme but dreames and fables unto many, yet Cicero him felfe shortly after proued this prophecie true: bicause that when he came of age to learne, he grewe so toward, and wanne suche same among the boyes, for cierous to his excellent wit and quicke capacitie. For thereuppon came the other boyes fathers them with selues to the schoole to see his face, and to be eye witnesses of the reporte that went of him. of his sharpe and quicke witte to learne. But others of the rude and baser sorte of men were offended with their sonnes, bicause to honor Cicero, they did alwayes put him in the middest between them, as they went in the streetes. Cisero in deede had suche a naturall witte and vnderstanding, as Plato thought meete for learning, and apt for the studie of Philosophie. For he gaue him felfe to all kinde of knowledge, and there was no arte, nor any of the liberall sciences, that he disdained: notwithstanding in his sirst young yeares he was apter, and better disposed to the studie of Poetrie, then any other. There is a pretie poeme of his in Cicro another verses of eight staues, called Pontius Glaucus, extant at this day, the which he made when he bis Post. was but a boye. After that, being geuen more earnestlie vnto this studie, he was not onely thought the best Orator, but the best Poet also of all the ROMANES in his time: and yet doth the excellencie of his eloquence, and commendacion of his tongue continewe, euen to this daye, notwithstanding the great alteracion and chaunge of the Latine tongue. But his Poetrie hath lost the name and estimacion of it, bicause there were many after him that be-D came farre more excellent therein then he. After he had left his childishe studies, he became then Philoss scholler, the Academicke Philosopher, the onely scholler of all Clisoma- Ciers, Philosopher shus schollers, whome the Romanes esteemed so muche for his eloquence, and loued more has schollers for his gentle behaviour and conversation. He gave him selse also to be a follower of Mu-the Academick Philips tim Scauola, who at that time was a greate man in Rome, and Prince of the Senate, and who footen did also instruct Cicero in the lawes of Rome. He did also followe Syllafor a time, in the characters. warres of the Marsians. But when he fawe that the common wealth of Roms fell to civill the Scanda warres, and from civill warres to a monarchie: then he returned againe to his booke and contemplative life, and frequented the learned men of GRECE, and alwayes studied with them, vntill Sylla had gotten the vpper hande, and that he faw all the common wealth againe at some stay. About that time, Sylla causing the goods of one that was sayd to be slaine, to be folde by the crier: (beinge one of the outlawes and proscriptes, to witte, banished by billes fette vp on postes) Chrysoganus, one of Syllaes freed bondemen, and in great fauour with his maister bought them for the summe of two thowsande Drachmes. Therewithall the some and heire of the deade person called Roseins, being maruelouslie offended, he shewed that it was too shamefull an abuse; for his fathers goodes amounted to the summe of two bundred and fiftie talentes. Sylla finding him felfe thus openlie touched with publike fraude whome his frendes did counsell and perswade boldly to take upon him the desence of Roseina cause: for he shoulde neuer have a happier occasion, nor so noble a beginning to bring him and deceite, for the onely granifyinge of his man: he procured Chrylogonus to accuse him, that he had killed his owne father. Neuer an Orator durft speake in Roseius behalfe to defende Roseius pun felfe into estimacion, asthis. Thereuppon Cicero determined to take his cause in hande. M and did handell it fo well, that he obteyned the thing he fued for: whereby he wanne him greate fame and credit. But yet being affrayed of Syllaes displeasure, he absented him selfe from Rome, and went into GRECE, gettinge it out that his trauell was for a difease he had vppon him. In deede Cicero was dogge leane, a little eater, and woulde also eate late, bicause of the greate weakenesse of his stomacke: but yet he had a good lowde voyce; though it was somewhat harshe, and lacked grace and comelynesse. Furthermore he was so earness and vehement in his Oration that he mounted still with his voyce into the highest sunes; insomuche that men were affrayed it woulde one daye put him in hazard of his life. When

Cierro, Antio- he came to ATHENS, he went to heare Antiochus of the citie of ASCALONA, and fell in greate likinge with his sweete tongue, and excellent grace, though otherwise he milliked & his newe opinions in Philosophie. For Antiochus had then forsaken the opinions of the newe Academicke Philosophers, and the sect of the Carneades: being moued thereunto. either through the manifest proofe of thinges, or by his certaine sudgement, or (as some fay) for that of an ambition or diffention against the schollers and followers of Clitomachus and Philo, he had reproued the refolucions of the Academickes, which he had of long time defended, onely to leane for the moste parte to the Stoickes opinions. Howebeit Cicero had most affection vnto the Academickes, and did studie that sect more then all the rest, of purpose, that if he sawe he were forbidden to practise in the common wealth at Rome, he woulde then goe to ATHENS (leauing all pleaes and Orators in the common wealth) to beflowe the rest of his time quietly in the studie of Philosophie. At length, when he hearde & newes of Syllaes death, and fawe that his bodie was growen to good state and health by ex-corrected. When he had ended his declamacion, all those that were present were amazed to heare him, and euerie man praised him one after an other. Howebeit Apollonius all the while Cicero spake, did neuer shewe any glad countenaunce; and when he had ended, he stayed a greate while and sayed neuer a worde. Cicero mishiking withall, Apollonius at length Wherefore when he came to Rome, at the first he proceeded verie warely, and discreetely, and did with willinglie feeke for any office, and when he did, he was not greatlie effectived: for the commonlie called him the GRECIAN, and scholler, which are two wordes, the which the artificers, (and fuche base mechanicall people at Romm Phane ener readie at their B tongues ende. This killed his hart straight, when he sawe that the reporte of his name and doinges, entring into the citie of Rome as into an infinite fea, was fo fodainely vanquished away againe, without any other fame or speach. But after that, when he looked into him felfe, and fawe that in reason he tooke an infinite labor in hande to attaine to glorie, wherein he fawe no certaine ende whereby to attaine vnto it: it cut of a great parte of the ambicion he had in his head. The Prætors being his Judges, and fauoring Verres, had made fo many reiornementes and delayes, that they had driven it of to the laste day of hearing. Cicero perceiuing then he shoulde not have day light to speake all that he had to fay against him, and that thereby nothing shoulde be done and judged the rose vp, and sayed, that there needed no further plea in this matter, but onely brought foorth the witnesses before the Iudges, and having caused their deposicions to be taken. he prayed they woulde proceede to fentence, according to their euidence geuen on that behalfe. Yet some doe reporte, that Cicero gaue many pleasaunt tawntes and girdes, in pleas ding the accusacion of the Sicilians against Verres. The Romanes doe call abore, Verres. There was one Cacilius, the sonne of a freed bondman, who was suspected to holde with R the supersticion of the Lewes. This Cacilius woulde have put by the Sicilians from following the accufacion of Verres, and woulde have had the matter of his accufacion only referred to him, for the profecuting of it against him. For, he had as many men dayly at his gate euerie morning, as either Crassus had for his wealth, or Pompey for his estimacion among the souldiers both of them being at that time the chiefest men of Rome. Yea furthermore, Pompeys selfe came vnto Cicero, bicause his Orations stoode him to great purpose, for thincrease of his honor and authoritie. Nowe when Cicero came to make fute to be Prætor (which is, to be as an ordinarie judge) though he had many competitors, and fellowe futers with him, yet was he first chosen affore them all: and he did so honestly behaue him selse in that office, that they did not so muche as once suspect him of briberie or extorcion. And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that Licinius Macer (a man that of him felfe was of great power, and vet favored and supported besides by Crassus) was accused before Cicero of thest and extorcion in his office: but he trustinge muche to his supposed credit, and to the greate succession in his office: but he trustinge muche to his supposed credit, and to the greate succession in his office: and labour his frendes made for him, went home to his house before sentence proceeded

He had a goodly house within the confines of the citie of Arpos, a farme also by NAPLES, and an other about the citie of Pompeli: but all these were no great thinges. of the inhabitauntes. For the noblemen, and of greatest corage, had spent all their landes in playes and feafts, or in buildings and common workes, which they built at their owne charge to currie fauour with the common people, that they might obtaine the chiefe offices : fo that thereby they became verie poore, and their goodes were in the handes of meanemen and wretches. Thus the state of Rome stoode in great hazard of vprore, the which any man might easely have procured, that durst have taken uppon him any change or alteracion of government, there was then suche division among them in the state. Catiline notwithstanding to provide him of a strong bullwarke to prosecute his intent, came to sue to be Consul, hoping that he should be chosen with Caine Antonius, a man that of him selfe was apt neither to doe any great good, nor much hurt, and yet that could be a great firength and aide vnto him that h woulde attempt any thing. Divers noble and wifemen forefeeing that, did procure Cicero to fue for the Confulshippe. The people accepted him, and reiected Catiline. Antonius and Cicero thereuppon were created Consuls, although that Cicero of all the suters for the Consulshin was but only a Knightes fonne, and not the fonne of a Senator of Rome, Nowe, though the common people ynderstoode not the secret practise and meaning of Catiline: yet at the beginning of Ciceroes Consulthippe, there fell out great trouble and contencion in the common wealth. For they of the one fide, whom Sylla had by his ordinaunces deposed from their dignities and offices in Rome (who were no small men, neither fewe in number) beganne to creepe into the peoples good will, alleaging many true and iust reasons against the tyrannicall power of Sylla: howebeit spoken in ill time, when it was out of time to make any chaunge or e alteracion in the common wealth. The Tribunes on the other fide preferred lawes and ordi-Alar prefer- naunces to further this deuise. They preferred the lawe to choose the Decemuiri, with soueraine power and authoritie through all ITALIE and SYRIA, and also through all the contries and provinces which Pompey had newly conquered to the Empire of Rome: to fell, and release all the landes belonging to the state of Rome, to accuse any man whome they thought good, to banishe any man, to restore the Colonies with people, to take what money they woulde out of the treasurie, to leavie men of warre, and to keepe them in pay as long as they thought good. For this great and absolute power of the Decemuiri, there were many menof great accompt that fauored this law, but Antonius chiefly, being colleague and fellowe Conful with Cicero, for he had good hope to be chosen one of these ten Commissioners : and sur- D thermore, it was thought that he was privile vnto Catilines conspiracie, and that he misliked it not, bicause he was so muche in det. And this was it that the noble men most seared of allother thinges. Thereuppon Cicero, to prouide first to preuent this daunger, graunted him the prouince of the realme of MACEDON: and the prouince of GAVLE being offered vnto him felfe, he refused it. By this good turne, he wanne Antonius like a hiered player making him to promise him that he would affist & aide him for the benefit of the common wealth, and that he would say no more, then he shoulde will him. When he had brought him to this, and had wonne him to his minde: he then beganne to be the bolder, and more flowtly to refift them that were authors of this innouation and new lawes. Cicero therefore in open Senate, did one day sharply reproue, and inuey against this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes would E have established. But thereby he did so terrifie the authors thereof, that there was not one man durst speake against him. This notwithstanding, the Tribunes afterwardes attempted once againe to haue it to passe, & appointed the Consuls to appeare before the people. Howbeit Cicero being nothing abashed at it, he commaunded the Senate to follow him. So he did eloquence o. nerthrew the not only ouerthrow this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes did preferre: but further-Lear of the De- more they were veterly discoraged and out of hope to bring any of their matters to passe they intended, he strooke them so dead with his eloquence. For Cicero onely of all men in Rous made the ROMANES know, how muche eloquence doth grace and beawtifie that which is honest, and how inuincible right and instice are, being eloquently set forth: and also how that a man that will be counted a wife Gouernor of a comman weale, should alwayes in his doinges F rather preferre profit, than to feeke to currie fauor with the common people: yet fo to vie his words, that the thing which is profitable, may not be also vnpleasant. And to proue his sweete

CICERO. & pleasant tongue, may be alleaged that which he did in the time of his Consulthing touching circum free the placing of men at the Theater to fee the pastimes. For before, the knights of Roma did fir mingled one with another amongst the common people, and tooke their place as they came, The first that made the difference between them, was * Marcus Otherat that time Prætor who, * other des made a law, by the which he appoynted feuerall feates for the knights, where they might from the first outside the same of the thenceforth fee the pastimes. The people tooke this grieuously, as a thing done to discounte- Tribune of nance them: infomuch that Otho comming afterwards into the Theater, all the common the people neople fel a whistling at him, to shame him withal. The knights also in contrariwise made him for dending roome amongst them, with great clapping of hands, in token of honor. Therewith the people of the Roman fell a whiftling lowder then before, and the knights in like manner to clapping of their handes. Knight from R and so grew to wordes one with another: that all the Theater was straight in vprore with it, people Civero vnderstanding it, went thither him selfe, & calling the people to the temple of the goddesse Bellona, he there so sharpely reproued them, and therewith so perswaded them, that returning presently to the Theater, they did then welcome and receive Otho with clapping of their handes, and contended with the knights which of them should doe him greatest honor. But now againe, the rebells of Catilines conspiracie (who were pretily cooled at the first for the feare they stoode in) began to be lustie againe, and to gather together, boldely incoraging one another to broachetheir practife, before Pompey returned, who was fayd to be on the way towards Rome with his armye. But besides them, those souldiers that had served before in the, Syllaer sould warres vnder Sylla, being dispersed vppe and downe ITALY, (but specially the best fouldiers a- red with te-in mong them dwelling in the good townes of THYSCAN) did ftirre vp Catiline to haften the enterprise, perswading them selves that they should once againe have goods enough at hand, to spoyle and ransacke at their pleasure. These souldiers having one Manline to their Captaine, that had borne office in the field under Sylla, conspyred with Catilin, and came to Rome to affist him in his fute: who purposed once againe to demaund the Consulship, being determined at the election to kill Cicero, in the tumult and hurly burly. The goddes also did plainly shewe by earthquakes, lightning & thunder, and by vision of spirits that did appeare, the secret practise and conspiracie: besides also, there fell out manifest conjectures & proofes by men that came to reueale them, how beit they had not power sufficient to encownter so noble a man, and of fo great power as Catilin was. Cicero therefore deferring the day of election, called Catilin into Cicero examin the Senate, and there did examine him of that which was reported of him . Catiline Supposing the Senate. there were many in the Senate that had good wills to rebell, and also bicause he would shewe him self ready vnto them that were of his conspiracie: he gaue Cicero a gentle aunswer, & faid thus, What doe I offend, fayd he, if that beeing two bodies in this towne, the one leane and weake, and throughly rotten, and hath a head: and the other being great, strong, & of power, hauing no head, I doe give it one? meaning vnder this darke aunswer, to signifie the people & Senate. This aunswer being made, Cicero was more affrayd then before, insomuch that he put on a brigantine for the fafetie of his body, & was accopanied with the chiefest men of Rome, and a great number of younge men besides, going with him from his house vnto the fielde of Mars, where the elections were made: & had of purpose lest open his jacket lose at the chol-F ler, that his brigantyne he had on might be seene, thereby to let euery man that saw him, know the daunger he was in. Euery man milliked it when they faw it, and came about him to defend him, if any offered to affayle him. But it fo came to paffe, that by voyces of the people, Catilin was againe rejected from the Confulthip, and Syllanus and Murana chosen Confuls. CICERO 920 therefore he prayed him that he would depart out of Rome to faue him felfe. Craffus having A red his owne letter, would not open the rest, but went forthwith vito Cicero, partly for feare of the danner, and partly also to cleere him felfe of the suspition they had of him for the friendthin that was betwirt him and Catiline. Citero counselling with them what was to be done, the next morning affembled the Senate very earely, and earling the letters with him he did deliuer them according to their direction, and commaunded they should read them out alowder All these letters, & every one of them particularly, did bewray the conspiracie. Furthermore, Quintus Arrim, a man of authoritie, and that had bene Prætor, tolde openly the fouldiers and men of warre that were leavied in THYSCAN. And it was reported also, that Manlius was in the fielde with a great number of fouldiers about the cities of Thyscan, gaping daily to heare newes of some change at ROME. All these thinges being throughly considered, a decree pasfed by the Senate, that they should referre the care of the common wealth vnto the Consuls, to thend that with absolute authoritie they might (as well as they could) provide for the safe. tie and preferuation thereof. Such manner of decree and authoritie, was not often feene concluded of in the Senate, but in time of present seare and daunger. Now Cicero having this abfolute power, he referred all forreine matters to Quintus Metellus charge, and did him felf take vppon him the care and gouernment of all civill affayres within Rome. On the day time when he went up and downe the towne, he had fuch a trowpe of men after him, that when he came through the great market place, he almost filled it with his trayne that followed him. Thereuppon Catiline would no lenger delay time, but refolued to goe him felfe vnto Manlius where their armie lay. But before he departed, he had drawen into his confederacie one Martine, & C an other called Cethegus, whome he commaunded betimes in the morning to goe to Ciceroes. house with short daggers to kil him, pretending to come to salute him, and to give him a good morow. But there was a noble woman of Rome, called Fuluia, who went ouer night vnto Citero, and bad him beware of that Cethegus, who in deede came the next morning betimes vnto him : but being denied to be let in, he began to chafe and raile before the gate. This made him the more to be suspected. In thend Citero comming out of his house, called the Senate to the temple of Iupiter Stator, (as much to fay, a stayer) which standeth at the vpper end of the holy streete as they goe to the Mount Palatine. There was Catiline with others, as though he ment to cleere him felfe of the suspition that went of him: howbeit there was not a Senator that place. And further, when he began to speake, he could have no audience for the great noyle they made against him. So at length Cicero rose, and commaunded him to avoid out of Rome

In the meane space, Cornelius Lentulus surnamed Sura (a man of a noble house, but of a wicked disposition, and that for his ill life was put of the Senate) affembled all the rest which were of Catilines conspiracie, and that remained behind him in Rome, and bad them be affraid of nothing. He was then Prætor the second time, as the manner is when any man comes to recouer againe the dignitie of a Senator which he had loft. It is reported that this furname of Sura was given him vpon this occasion. He being Treasorer in Syllaes Dictatorship, did fondly C. Lentulus waste and consume a maruelous summe of money of the common treasure. Sylla being offenwhy called SHTA. ded with him for it, and demaunding an accompt of him before the Senate: he carelelly and contemporoufly stepped forth, saying he could make him no other accompt, but shewed him the calfe of his legge, as children doe, when they make a fault attennys. And thereof it came F that euer after that they called him Sura, bicause Sura in Latin signifieth, the calfe of the legge. Another time also being accused for a lewde part he had committed, he bribed some of the

A ludges with money, and being onely quit by two voyces more which he had in his fauor, he fave he had lost his money he had given to one of those two Iudges, bicause it was enough for him to be cleered by one voice more. This man being of this disposition, was first of all incenfed by Catiline, and lastly marred by certaine wisards & false prognosticators that had moc- that should ked him with a vaine hope, finging verses vnto him which they had fayned and deuised, and raigne at false prophecies also, which they bare him in hande they had taken out of Sybilles bookes of Rome. prophecie, which fayd: that there should raigne three Corneli at Rome, of the which, two had already fulfilled the prophecie, Cinna and Sylla, and for the third, fortune layd it vpon him, and therefore bad him goe thorow withall, and not to dreame it out losing oportunitie as Catiline haddone. Now this Lentulus vndertooke no small enterprise, but had an intent with him to kil all the whole Senate, and as many other Citizens as they could murther, and to fet fire of Rome by C. Rome, sparing none but Pompeys sonnes, whome they would reserve for pledges, to make their Lentulus, and peace afterwards with Pompey. For the rumor was very great and certein also, that he returned from very great warres and conquests which he had made in the East contryes. So they laved a plat to put their treason in execution in one of the nights of Saturnes feastes. Further, they had brought flaxe and brimstone, and a great number of armors and weapons into Cetheque house. Besides all this prouision, they had appoynted a hundred men in an hundred partes of the citie, to the ende that fire being rayled in many places at one tyme, it should the sooner ronne through the whole citie. Other men also were appoynted to stoppe the pypes and water conduits which brought water to Rome, and to kill those also that came for water to Gouench the fire. In all this sturre, by chaunce there were two Ambassadors of the ALLOBRO-GES, whose contry at that tyme did much mislike of the ROMANES, and were vnwilling to be subject vnto them. Lentulus thought these men very fit instruments to cause all GAVLE to rebell. Thereuppon practifing with them, he wannethem to be of their conspiracie, and gaue them letters directed to the counsell of their contrie, and in them did promise them freedom.

Hefent other letters also vnto Catilin, and perswaded him to proclaime libertie to all bond-men, and to come with all the speede he could to Rome: and sent with them one Titus of the citie of CROTONA, to cary these letters. But all their counsells and purposes (like fooles that neuer met together but at feastes, drincking droncke with light women) were easily found out by Cicero: who had a carefull eye vpon them, and very wifely and discreetely sawe thorow them. For he had appoynted men out of the citie to spie their doings, which followed them to fee what they intended. Furthermore he spake fecretly with some he trusted, (the which o-heard the euidence of the witnesses. Further, there was one Iunius Syllanus a Senator that gaue ineuidence, that some heard Cethegus say they should kill three Consuls, and source Prætors.

Sulpitius a Prætor, that was fent into Cethegus house, reported that he had found great store of darts, armor, daggers and swordes new made, Lastly, the Senate having promised Titus CRO-TONIAN he should have no hurt, so he would tell what he knew of this conspiracie: Lentulus thereby was continued, and driven to give vppe his office of Prætor before the Senate, and chaunging his purple gowne, to take another meete for his miserable state. This being done, Lentulus and his consorts were committed to warde, to the Prætors houses. Now growing towards evening, the people waiting about the place where the Senate was affembled, Cicero at length came out, and told them what they had done within. Thereuppon he was conueyed by

At length he watched them one night so narrowly, that he tooke the Ambassadors, and The confinded Titus CROTONIAN with the letters he caried, by helpe of the Ambassadors of the Allo-BROGES, which had fecretly informed him of all before. The next morning by breake of day, Civero affembled the Senate in the temple of Concorde, and there openly red the letters, and ther of the Conful then being the Vestal Nunnes being present at it. Now Cicero being comen A into his neighbours house, beganne to bethinke him what course he were best to take in this matter. For, to punish the offenders with seueritie, according to their deserts, he was afraid to doe it: both bicause he was of a curteous nature, as also for that he would not seeme to be glad to have occasion to shew his absolute power and authorities to punish (as he might) with rigour, Citizens that were of the noblest houses of the citie, & that had besides many friends And contrariwise also, being remisse in so waightie a matter as this, he was affraid of the daunger that might enfue of their rafhnes, mistrusting that if he should punish them with lesse then death, they would not amend for it, imagining they were well rid of their trouble, but would rather become more bold and desperate then euer they were: adding moreouer the styng and foight of a new emalice vnto their accustomed wickednes, besides that he him selfe should be R thought a coward and tymerous man, whereas they had already not much better opinion of him. Cicero being perplexed thus with these doubts, there appeared a miracle to the Ladies. doing facrifice at home in his house. For the fire that was thought to be cleane out vpon the aulter where they had facrificed there sodainely rose out of the imbers of the ryend or barkes which they had burnt, a great bright flame, which amased all the other Ladies. Howbeit the Vestall Mines willed Terentia (Ciceroes wife) to go straight vnto her husband. & to bid him not to be affraid to execute that boldly which he had confidered of, for the benefit of the comon wealth: and that the goddesse had raised this great slame, to shewe him that he should have great honor by doing of it. Terentia, that was no timerous nor faint harted woman but very ambitious, and furthermore had gotten more knowledge from her husband of the affayres of C the state, then otherwise she had acquainted him with her housewivery in the house, as Cicero him selfe reporteth: the went to make report thereof vnto him, and prayed him to doe execut tion of those men. The like did Quintus Cicero his brother, and also Publius Nigidius, his friend and fellow student with him in Philosophie, and whose counsell also Cicero followed much in the government of the common wealth. The next morning, the matter being propounded to the arbitrement of the Senate, how these malesactors should be punished: Syllanus being asked his opinion first, said that they should be put in prison, and from thence to suffer execution. Others likewife that followed him, were all of that minde, but Caius Cafar, that afterwards came to be Dictator, and was then but a young man, and began to come forward, but yet such a one as by his behauior and the hope he had tooke fuch a course, that afterwards he brought D the common wealth of Rome into an absolute Monarchie. For at that time Cicero had vehement fuspicions of Cesar, but no apparant proofe to conuince him. And some say, that it was brought so neare, as he was almost conuicted, but yet saued him selfe. Other write to the contrary that Cicero wittingly diffembled that he either heard or knew any fignes which were told him against Casar, being affraid in deede of his friends and estimation. For it was a cleere case, that if they had accused Casar with the rest, he undoubtedly had sooner saued all their lines, then he should have lost his owne. Nowe when Cafar came to deliver his opinion touching the punishment of these prisoners: he stoode up and sayde, that he did not thinke it good to put them to death, but to confiscate their goods: and as for their persons, that they should beflow them in prison, some in one place, some in another, in such cities of ITALY, as pleased Ci- E cerabeff would the warre of Catilia were ended. This fentence being very mild, and the author thereof maruelous eloquent to make it good: Cicero him felf added thereunto a counterpeale, inclining vnto either of both the opinions, partly allowing the first, and partly also the opinion of Calar. His friends thinking that Calars opinion was the fafeft for Cicero, bicause thereby he should deserve lesse blame for that he had not put the prisoners to death: they followed rather the fecond. Whereuppon Syllanus also recanted that he had spoken, and expounded his opinion: faying, that when he spake they should be put to death, he ment nothing so, but thought the last punishment a Senator of Rome could have, was the prison. But the first that contraried this opinion, was Catulus Luctatius, and after him Cato, who with vehement words enforced Cafars suspition, and furthermore filled all the Senate with wrath and corage: so that even upon the instant it was decreed by most voyces, that they should suffer death. But C.e/ar stept vp again, & spake against the confiscation of their goods, misliking that they should

a reject the gentleft part of his opinion, and that contrariwife they thould flicke unto the ferren rest onely: how beit bicause the greatest number prenailed against him he called the Tribunes to avde him, to the ende they should withstand it : but they would give no eare vnto him. Citethereupon yelding of him felf, did remit the confiscation of their goods, and went with the Senate to fetche the prisoners: who were not all in one house; but enery Prætor had one of them. So he went first to take C. Lentulus, who was in the Mount Palatine, and brought him through the holy streete and the market place, accompanied with the chiefest men of the cirie, who compassed him round about, and garded his person. The people seeing that a quaked and trembled for feare, passed by, and sayd neuer a word; and specially the younge men who thought it had bene some solemne misterie for the health of their contry, that was so accompanied with the chiefe Magistrate, and the noble men of the citie, with terror and feare i So. The execute when he had passed through the market place, and was come to the prison, he deliueted Len- @inorthe rules into the handes of the hangman, and commaunded him to doe execution. Afterwardes allo Cethegue, and then all the rest one after another, whome he brought to the prison him selfe, and caused them to be executed. Furthermore, seeing divers of their accomplices in a trowpe together in the market place, who knewe nothing what he had done, and watched onely till night were come, supposing then to take away their companions by force from the place where they were thinking they were yet aliue : he turned vnto them, and foake alowd, they lived. This is a phrase of speeche which the Romanes vse sometyme, when they will finely convey the hardnes of the speeche, to say he is dead. When night was comen, and that bed for the he was going homeward, as he came through the market place, the people did wayte voon dead. him no more with filence as before, but with great cryes of his praise, and clapping of handes Champail in enery place he went, and called him Sauior, and fecond founder of Rome, Befides all this, at enery mans dore there were lynckes and torches lighted, that it was as light in the streetes, as at noone dayes. The very women also did put lights out of the toppes of their houses to doe him honor, and also to see him so nobly brought home, with such a long trayne of the chiefeftmen of the citie, of the which many of them had ended great warres for the which they had triumphed, and had obteyined many famous conquests to the Empire of Rome, both by fea and land) confessing between them selves one to another, that the ROMANES were greatly bound to many Captaines and generalls of armies in their time, for the wonderfull riches, D fpoyles, and increase of their power which they had wonne: howbeit that they were to thanke Citero onely, for their health and preservation, having saued them from so great and extreme a daunger. Not forthat they thought it fo wonderfull an acte to have striken dead the enterprise of the conspirators, and also to have punished the offenders by death: but bicause the conspiracie of Carilin being so great and daungerous an insurrection as euer was any the had quenched it, and pluckt it vp by the rootes, with fo small hurt, and without vprore, trouble, or actuall fedition. For the most part of them that were gathered together about Catiline, when they heard that Lentulus and all the rest were put to death, they presently forsooke him; and Catiline him felfe also fighting a battell with them he had about him against Antonius the of Carilin flatne ther Conful with Gicero, he was flayne in the fielde, and all his armie defeated. This notwith- in banell by E standing there were many that spake ill of Cicero for this facte, and ment to make him repent it having for their heades Cafar, (who was already chosen Prætor for the yeare to come) "Die cafar chosen tellus and Bestia, who should also be chosen Tribunes. as though this misfortune euer followed him to take away his excellent grace. But nowe, though he had this worme of ambition, and extreme couetous defire of honor in his head, ver did he normalice or enuy any others glory, but would very franckly praise excellent men, as ciero friend- well those that had bene before him, as those that were in his time. And this appeareth plain- C ly in his writings. They have written also certaine notable wordes he spake of some auncient men in olde time, as of Aristotle: that he was like a golden flowing river: and of Plato, that if Iupiter him selfe would speake, he would speake like him: and of Theophrastus, he was wont to call him his delight: & of Demosthenes orations, when one asked him on a time which of them he liked best: the longest saide he. There be divers writers also, who to shewe that they were great followers of Demosthenes, doe followe Ciceroes saying in a certaine epistle he wrote vnto one of his friends, wherein he faid that Demosthenes slept in some of his orations: but yet they forget to tel how highly he praifed him in that place, and that he calleth the orations which he wrote against Antonius (in the which he tooke great paines, and studied more then all the rest) PHILIPPIANS: to followe those which Demostheres wrote against Philip king of Mace- D DON, Furthermore, there was not a famous man in all his tyme, either in eloquence, or in learning, whose fame he hath not commended in writing, or otherwise in honorable speech of him. For he obteyned of Cafar, when he had the Empire of Rome in his handes, that Cratippus the Peripateticke Philosopher was made Citizen of Rome. Further, he procured that by decree of the court of the Areopagites, he was intreated to remaine at ATHENS, to teach and instruct the youth there: for that he was a great honor & ornament vnto their city. There are extant also of Ciceroes epiftles vnto Herodes, & others vnto his sonne, willing him to follow Cratippus in his studie and knowledge. He wrote an other letter also vnto Gorgius the Rethoritian, and forbad him his fonnes company: bicause he understood he intised him to dronkennes, & to other great dishonestie. Of all his epistles he wrote in greeke, there is but that onely written E incholler, and another which he wrote vnto Pelops BYZANTINE. And for that he wrote to Gorgias, he had great reason to be offended with him, and to tawnt him in his letter: bicause (asit teemed) he was a man of very lewde life and convertation. But in contrary manner, writing as he did to Pelops, finding him felfe greued with him, for that he was negligent in procuring the BYZANTINES to ordeine some publike honors in his behalfe: that me thinkes proceeded of ouermuch ambition, the which in many things made him too much forget the part of an honest man, and onely bicause he would be commended for his eloquence. When he had on a time pleaded Munatim cause before the Judges, who shortly after accused Sabinus a friend of his: it is reported that he was so angry with him, that he told him, what Munatine, hast thou forgotten that thou wert discharged the last day of thine accusation, not for thine innocency, but for a miste I cast before the Judges eies, that made them they could not discerne the fault? Why, how now, sayde Crassus: didest thou not thy selfe highly prayse me in this place. the last day? I can not deny it, sayd Cicero: but in deede I tooke an ill matter in hand to shewe mine eloquence. An other time Crassus chaunced to say in an open affembly, that none of all the Crass of his house that ever lived above lx yeares; and afterwards againe repenting him felfe, he called it in againe, and fayde, Sure I knewe not what I did, when I fayd fo, Cicero aunfwered him againe: thou knewest well enough the people were glad to heare it, and there-

Of Crassis sonnes, one of them did much resemble Attims, and therefore his mother had an ill name by him: one daye this fonne of Craffus made an oration before the Senate, which divers of them commended very muche. Now this Vitinius having a So the grace iwollen necke, one daye pleading before Cicero: he called him the fwollen Orator. Another of the equinotyme when he heard fay that he was dead, and then that he was aliue againe: a vengeance on cation can not be experified him, fayde he, that hath lyed so shamefully. Another tyme when Casar had made a lawe for in any other the deuiding of the lands of CAMPANIA vnto the fouldiers: divers of the Senate were angry hanguage. with him for it, and among other, Lucius Gellius (a very olde man) faid, he would neuer graunt ir while he lived. Cicero pleasauntly aunswered againe, alas, tary a litle, the good olde man will not trouble you long. Another tyme there was one Octavius, supposed to be * an African * Bicanfe the horne. He when Cicero on a time pleaded a matter, faide that he heard him not: Cicero pre-have common fently aunswered him againe, and yet haft thou a hole bored through thine care. Another lytheir eares time Metellus Nepos told him, that he had ouerthrowen moe men by his witnes, then he had faued by his eloquence. I graunt faid Cicero, for in deede I have more faith, then eloquence in me. So was there also a younge man that was suspected to have poyloned his father with a tarte, that boafted he would reuile Cicero: I hadrather have that of thee, & Cicero, then thy tarte. Publius Sextius also having a matter before the Iudges, enterteyned Cicero, with other of his Counfellers: but yet he would speake all him felfe, and give none of the Orators leave to fay any thing. In the ende, when they fawe plainely that the Iudges would discharge him. being ready to give fentence: Cicero faide vnto him, besturre thee hardily to day for to morrowe Sextius thou shalt be a private man. Another, one Publius Scotta, who would fayne have bene thought a wife Lawyer, and yet had litle witte and understanding: Cicero appealed to him as a witnes in a matter, and being examined, he aunswered he knewe nothing of it. Cicero replied to him againe: thou thinkest peraduenture they aske thee touching the law. E Againe, Metellus Nepos, in a certaine disputacion he had with Cicero, did many times repeate, who is thy father? Cicero aunswered him againe: thy mother hath made this question harder for thee to auniwer. This Nepos mother was reported to be a light housewife, and he as futtle witted and vnconstant. For he being Tribune, left in a geere the exercise of his office, and went into Syriato Pompey, vpon no occasion: and as fondly againe he returned thence, vpon a fodaine. His Schoolemaister Philager also being dead, he buried him very honeftly, and fet a crowe of stone vpon the toppe of his tombe. Cicero finding it, tolde him thou hast done very wisely: for thy Maister hath taught thee rather to flie, then to speake. Another time Appius Clodius pleading a matter, faide in his preamble that his friende had earneftly requested him to employe all his knowledge, diligence, and faith vpon this matter. O goddes, laide Cicero, and hast thou shewed thy selfe so harde harted to thy friende, that thou halt performed none of all these he requested thee? Nowe to vie these fine tawnts and girds to his enemies, it was a parte of a good Orator: but so commonly to girde every man to make the people laughe, that wanne him greate ill will of many, as shall appeare by some A examples I will tell vou. Marcus Aquinius had two fonnes in lawe, who were both banished: Cicero therefore called him Adrastus. Lucius Cotta by chaunce also was Censor at that tyme, when Cicero fued to be Conful: and beeing there at the daye of the election, he was a thurst, and was driven to drinke. But while he dranke, all his friendes stoode about him, and after he had dronke, he faide vnto them. It is well done of ye, fayde he, to be affrayed leaft the Cenfor should be angry with me, bicause I drinke water: for it was reported the Cenfor loued wine well. Another tyme Cicero meeting one Voconius, with three fowle Daughters of his with him, he cryed out alowd: This man hath gotten children in despight of Phæbus. It was thought in Rome that Marcus Gellius was not borne of free parents by father and R mother, who reading certaine letters one daye in the Senate very lowde: Cicero fayde vnto them that were about him, wonder not at it, o he, for this man hath beene a cryer in his dayes. Faustus, the some of Sylla Dictator at Rome, which sette yppe billes outlawing diuers Romanes, making it lawefull for any man to kill them without daunger where they founde them: this man after he had spent the moste parte of his fathers goods, was so fore in debt, that he was driven to fell his houshold stuffe, by billes sette up on every poste. Girero when he sawe them, yea mary saide he, these billes please me better, then those which his father fette vppe. These tawntes and common quippes without purpose, made divers men to malice him. The great ill will that Clodius bare him, beganne vppon this occasion. Clodius was of a noble house, a younge man, and very wilde and insolent. He being in love C with Pompeia Cafars wife, founde the meanes secretly to gette into Cafars house, apparelled like a younge finging wenche, bicause on that daye the Ladyes of Rome did solemnly celebrate a secret sacrifice in Casars house, which is not lawefull for men to be present at. So there was no man there but Clodius, who thought he shoulde not have bene knowen, bicause he was but a younge man without any heare on his face, and that by this meanes he might come to Pompeia amongeft the other women. He beeing gotten into this great house by night, not knowing the roomes and chambers in it: there was one of Casars mothers maydes of her chamber called Aurelia, who feeing him wandring vp and downe the house in this forte, asked him what he was, and how they called him. So being forced to aunswer, he faide he fought for Aura, one of Pompeias maides. The maide perceived straight it was no D womans voice, and there with al gaue a great shriche, and called the other women: the which did see the gates fast shut, and then sought every corner vp and downe, so that at length they found him in the maides chamber, with whom he came in. His offence was straight blowen abroad in the citie, whereuppon Cafar put his wife away: and one of the Tribunes also accufed Clodius, and burdened him that he had prophaned the holy ceremonies of the facrifices, Cicero at that time was yet his friend, beeing one that had very friendly done for him at all though it feemeth Cicero gaue not this euidence fo muche for the truthes fake, as to please enidence against Clodina his wife Terentia: for the hated Clodins to the deathe, bicause of his sister Clodia that would haue maried Cicero, and did fecretly practife the mariage by one Tullius, who was Ciceroes very friende, and bicause he repayred very often to this Clodia that dwelt harde by Cicero, Lucullus also brought forthe cer- F tayne Maydens which deposed that Clodius had deflowed the youngest of his owne sisters, the beeing in house with him, and maryed. times, and had euer accompanied him to garde him, if any man would have offered him iniurie in the busie time of the conspiracie of Catiline, Clodius stowtly denied the matter he was burdened with, and faide that he was not in Rome at that time, but farre from thence. Howbeit Cicero gaue euidence against him, and deposed, that the selfe same daye he came home E to his house vnto him, to speake with him about certaine matters. This in deede was true,

The Judges being affrayed of its got a great number of armed men about them, at the day of his judgemet, for the fafetic of their persons: and in the tables where they wrote their fentences, their letters for the most part were confufedly fet downe. This notwithstanding, it was found that he was quit by the greatest number: chain a and it was reported also that some of them were close fifted . Catalan therefore meeting with and formation

I some of them going home, after they had given their sentence, told them: sufely we had good gifts reason to be well garded for your safetie, for you were affraid your money should have benetaken from you, which you tooke for bribes. And Cicero fayd vnto Clodius, who reproued him that his witnes was not true he gaue against him: cleane contrary of Cicero for fine and twenry of the Iudges have beleved me, beeing fo many that have condemned thee, and the thirty would not beleeve thee, for they would not quit thee before they had fingered money. Notwithstanding, in this iudgement Cafar neuer gaue euidence against Clodius: & faid moreouers that he did not think his wife had committed any adultery, how beit that he had put ber away, cafainoidis bicause he would that Cesars wife should not only be clean from any dishonesty, but also void; of the putting of all suspinion. Clodius being quit of this accusation and trouble, & hauing also found meanes. Despeta. To be chosen Tribune: he beganne straight to persecute Cieero, chaunging all thinges, and Closine hauf to be chosen I ribune: no beganne tranger to perfective diserse, channing art tinges, and for Tribune filtring up all manner of people against him. First he wanne the good will of the common of the people. people by deutling of newelawes which he preferred, for their benefit and commoditie: to Pife and Gaboth the Confuls he graunted great and large provinces : vnto Pifo, MACRDON, and to Ga-bining Conbinius, SYRIA. He made also many poore men free Citizens, and had alwayes about him a great number of flaues armed. At that present tyme there were three notable men in Rome, Crassia, Pointwhich caried all the swaye: Crassus, that showed him selfe an open enemie vnto Givero: Pom- for three of pey the other, made muche both of the one and the other: the third was Cafar, who was pre-the greatest pared for his iorney into GAVLE with an armie . Cicero did leane vnto him, (though he knewe menin Rome, him no fast friende of his, and that he mistrusted him for matters past in Catilines confpira- with Clodinis D cie) and prayed him that he might goe to the warres with him, as one of his Lieuetenants, against citers Cafar graunted him . Thereuppon Clodius perceiving that by this meanes he got him out of the daunger of his office of Tribuneship for that yeare, he made fayer weather with him (as though he ment to reconcile him felfe vnto him) and tolde him that he had cause rather to thinke ill of Terentia, for that he had done against him, then of him selfe, and alwayes spake very curreously of him as occasion fell out, and sayde he did thinke nothing in him, nether had any malice to him, how beit it did a litle griene him, that being a friend, he was offered vnkindnes by his friend. These sweete wordes made Cicero no more affraied, so that he gaue vp his Lieuetenancie vnto Casar, and beganne againe to pleade as he did before. Casar tooke this in fuch disdaine, that he hardened Clodius the more against him, and besides, made Pompey

So the many of the Senators ranne out of the Senat, crying, & tearing their clothes for forow. Howbeit thefermen feeing all that, were nothing the more moned with pity and shame: but either Cicero must needes absent him selfe, or els determine to fight with Clodius. Then went Citero

But Pompey beeing tolde that he was come, had not the mosse chiro harte to suffer him to come to him, to looke him in the face: for he hadbene past all shame to haue refused the request of so worthy a man, who had before shewed him suche pleasure, a and also done and sayde fo many thinges in his fauor. Howbeit Pompey beeing the sonne in lawe of Cefar, did vnfortunately (at his request) forfake him at his neede, vnto whome he was bownde for fo many infinite pleafures, as he had receyued of him afore: and therefore when he hearde faye he came to him, he went out at his backe gate and woulde not speake with him . So Cicero feeing him felfe betrayed of him , and nowe having no other refugeto whome he might repayre vnto: he put him felfe into the handes of the two Confuls. Of them two, Gabinius was ever cruell, and churlishe vnto him. But Piso on thother side spake alwayes very curteously vnto him, and prayed him to absent him selfe for a tyme, and to giue place a litle to Clodine furie, and paciently to beare the chaunge of the tyme: For info doing the might come agayne another tyme to be the preseruer of his contry, which was C nowe for his fake in tumult and sedition . Citero vpon this aunswer of the Conful, consulted with his friendes: among the which Lucullus gave him advise to tary, and favd that he should be the stronger. But all the rest were of contrary opinion, and would have him to get him away with speede: for the people would shortly wishe for him agayne, when they had once bene beaten with Clodius turie and folly. Cicero liked best to followe this counsell. Whereupport having had a statue of Minerus a long tyme in his house, the which he greatly reueciteres exile renced: he caried her him felfe, and gaue her to the Capitoll with this infcription: Vntoc Minerua, Protector of Rome. So, his friends having given him fafe conduct, he went out of Rome about midnight, and tooke his way through the contry of LVKE by lande, meaning to goe into Sicile. Whenit was knowen in Rome that he was fledde, Clodius did presently ba- D nishe him by decree of the people, and caused billes of inhibition to be sette vppe, that no man should secretly receive him within five hundred myles compasse of ITALY. Howbeit diuers men reuerencing Cicero, made no reckoning of that inhibition: but when they had vfed him with all manner of currefie possible, they did conduct him besides at his departure, fauing one citie onely in LVKE, called at that tyme HIPPONIVM, and nowe VIBONE: where aliás Vibone:

a Sicilian called Vibius, (vnto whome Cicero before had done many pleasures, and specially amonge others, had made him Maister of the workes in the yeare that he was Conful) would not once receyue him into his house, but promised him he woulde appoynt him? place in the contry that he might goe vnto. And Caius Virgilius alfo, at that tyme Prætor A wonder thewed vato cierret faint standing that many men came to see him for the goodwill they bare him and that the cities basinhisex of GRECE contended who should most honor him, he was alwayes sadde, and could not F friends, not to call him Orator, but rather Philosopher: faying, that Philosophie was his chiefest profession, & that for his eloquence he did not vie it, but as a necessary instrument to one that pleadeth in the common wealth. But glory, and opinion, hath great power to take mans full power of reason from him, even like a culler, from the minds of them that are common pleaders in mater glory. ters of state, and to make them feele the felfe same passions that common people doe, by dayly frequenting their companie: vales they take great heede of them, and that they come to practife in the common wealth with this resolute minde, to have to doe with the like matters. that the common people haue, but not to entangle them selues with the like passions and moodes, by the which their matters doe rife. Nowe Clodius was not contented that he had ba-B nished Cicero out of ITALY, but further he burnt all his houses in the contry, and his house also fo in ROME standing in the market place, of the which he built a temple of libertie, and caused his goods to be folde by the cryer: fo that the cryer was occupied all dayelong crying the goods to be fold, and no man offered to buye any of them. The chiefest men of the citie beginning to be afrayd of these violent parts, and having the common people at his commaun-came out of his house, and compelled Clodius to get him out of the market place, and then at the charge of the common wealth. So Cicero returned the fixtenth moneth after his banishment, and the townes and cities he came by , shewed them selues so joyfull of his returne, that all manner of men went to meete and honor him, with fo great love and affection, that Ciceroes reporte thereof afterwardes came in deede (hort of the very truth as it was, Thereuppon Pompey the night before tooke the highest places of the market place. by his fouldiers that were armed, whome he placed thereabout. Milo fearing that Citera woulde bee affraied to fee fuche a number of harnest men about him, beeing no viuall marter, and that it might peraduenture hinder him to pleade his cause well: he prayed him he woulde come betymes in the morning in his litter into the market place, and there to staye R the comming of the Iudges, till the place were full. For Cicero was not onely fearefull in warres, but timerous also in pleading. For in deede he neuer beganne to speake, but it was in feare: and when his eloquence was come to the best proofe and perfection, he never left his trembling and timerousnes. Infomuch that pleading a case for Mutius Murana (accufed by Cato, I ftriuing to excell Hortensius, whose pleading was very well thought of: he tooke

Yet many held opinion that this timerousnes of Cicero came rather of the goodwill he bare vnto his friends. then of any cowardly minde of him felfe. He was also chosen one of the Priestes of the Soothefayers, which they call Augures, in the roome of P. Crassus the younger, who was

flayne in the Realme of PARTHIA. Afterwardes, the prouince of CILICIA being appropried to him, with an armie of twelue thowfand footemen, and two thowfand fine hundred horsemen, he tooke the sea to goe thither. So when he was arrived there, he brought CAPPA- D DOCIA agayne into the subjection and obedience of king Ariobarzanes according to his commission and commaundement given by the Senate: moreover, both there and elsewhere he tooke as excellent good order as could be deuiled, in reducing of thinges to quietnes, without warres. Furthermore, finding that the CILICIANS were growen somewhat stowt and vnruly, by the ouerthrowethe Romanes had of the Parthians, and by reason of therifing and rebellion in Synia: he brought them vnto reason by gentle perswasions, and neuer ciceroes inter-received giftes that were fent him, no not from Kinges and Princes. from Rome, to praye him to fende him fome Leoperds, or Panthers out of CILICIA. bicause he woulde shewe the people some pastyme with them. Cicero boasting of his doinges, wrote to him agayne, that there were no more Leoperds in Cilicia, but that they were all fledde into CARIA for anger, that seeing all thinges quiet in CILICIA, they had leafure now to hunte them. So when he returned towardes Rome, from the charge of his gouernment, he came by RHODES: and stayed a few dayes at ATHENS, with great delight, to remember how pleafauntly he lived there before, at what time he studied there. Thisher came to him the chiefest learned men of the citie, and his frendes also, with whom he was acquainred at his first being there. In fine, having received all the honorable enterteinment in GRECE that could be : he returned vnto Rome, where at his arrivall he found great factions kindled.

the which men faw plainly would growe in the ende to civill warre. Thereuppon the Senate having decreed that he should enter in triumphe into the citie; he aunswered, that he would rather (all parties agreed) follow Cafars coche in triumphe. So he trauelled verie earnestly betwene Pompey and Cafar, eftloones wryting vnto C.efar, and also speaking vnto Pompey that was present, seeking all the meanes he coulde, to take up the quarrell and misliking betweet them circus ficketh two. But it was so impossible a matter, that there was no speeche of agreement woulde take to pacific the place. So Pompey hearing that Cafar was not farre from Rome, he durst no lenger abide in west Pom-

ROME, but fled with divers of the greatest men in Rome. Cicero would not followe him when 29 and Carhe fled, and therefore men thought he would take parte with Cafar: but this is certaine, that far he was in a maruelous perplexitie, and could not eafely determine what way to take. Whereuppon he wrote in his Epistells: what way should I take? Pomper hath the juster and honester into GRECE, and there to be quiet from them both. Cicero marueling that Cafar wrote not to cause of warre, but Cesar can better execute, and prouide for him selfe and his frendes with cienter better safetie: so that I have meanes enow to sie, but none to whome I might repaire. In all ports of this sturre, there was one of Casars frendes called Trebatius, which wrote a letter vnto Cicero, Casars and told him that Cafar wished him in any case to come to him, and to run with him the hope & fortune he vndertooke: but if he excused him selfe by his age, that then he should get him him him felfe, aunswered in anger, that he would doe nothing vnworthie of his actes all the dayes of his life thitherto: & to this effect he wrote in his letters. Now Cafar being gone into change gonth SPAYNE, Cicero imbarked immediatly to go to Pompey. So when he came vnto him, cuery man ome Pass was very glad of his comming, but Cato. Howbeit Cato fecretly reproved him for comming vnto Pompey, faying: that for him felfe he had bene without all honestie at that time to have forfaken that parte, the which he had alwayes taken and followed from the beginning of his first practife in the common wealth: but for him on thother fide, that it had bene better for the fafetie of his contrie, and chiefly for all his frendes, that he had bene a newter to both and fo to have taken thinges as they had fallen out: and that he had no maner of reason nor instant cause to make him to become Casars enemie, and by comming thither to put him selfe into fo great perill. These perswasions of Cato overthrewe all Ciceroes purpose and determination. belides that Pompey him selfe did not employe him in any matter of service or importance, But hereof him felfe was more in fault then Pompey, bicause he confessed openly that he did E repent him he was come thither. Furthermore, he scorned and disdained all Pompeys pre-paracions and counfells, the which in deede made him to be had in gealousie and suspicion.

Also he would euer be fleering and gybing at those that tooke Pompeys parte, though he had no lift him felfe to be merie. He would also goe vp and downe the campe very sad and heavy.

but yet he woulde euer haue one geast or other to make men laugh, although they had as little lust to be merie as he: and surely, it shall doe no hurte to call some of them to minde in this place. Domitius being verie defirous to preferre a gentleman to haue charge of men, to recommende him, he fayd he was an honest, wife, and sober man. Whereto Cicero presently answered. Why doest thou not kepe him then to bring up thy children? An other time when they commended Theophanes LESBIAN, (that was maister of all the artificers of the campe) F bicause he had notablic comforted the RHODIANS when they had received a greate losse of their nauy: fee, fayd Cicero, what a goodly thing it is to have a GRECIAN, master of artificers in the campe? When both battells came to joyne together, and that Cafar had in manner all fav all Calars frendes were madde, and melancholy men. Why, of Cicero to him againe: doeff thou fay that they doe enuie Cafar? An other called Martine, comming lately out of ITALIE favd, that there ranne a rumor in Rome, that Pompey was befreged. What, & Cicero to him againe: and diddeft thou take shippe to come and see him thy selfe, bicause thou mightest beleue it, when thou haddest seene it? Pompey being ouerthrowen, one Nonius sayed there was yet good hope left, bicause they had taken seuen Eagles within Pompeys campe. Thy perswation were not ill, o Cicero, to we were to fight but with pyes or dawes. Labienus reposed all his trust in certaine Oracles, that Pompey of necessitie must have the vpper hand. Yea fayd Cicero. but for all this goodly stratageame of warre, we have not longe fince lost our whole campe. After the battell of Pharfalia, where Cicero was not by reason of his sickenesse: Pompey being B fled, and Cate at that time at DYRRACHIVM, where he had gathered a great number of men of warre, & had also prepared a great nauie : he prayed Cicero to take charge of all this army, as it perteyned vnto him, having bene Conful, Cicero did not only refuse it, but also tolde them he would meddle no more with this warre. But this was enough to have made him bene slaine: for the younger Pompey and his frendes called him traitor, and drewe their fwordes you him to kill him, which they had done, had not Cato stepped between them and him, and yet had he muche a doe to faue him, and to convey him fafely out of the campe. When Cicero came to Bryndysium, he stayed there a certaine time for Cafars comming, who came but flowly, by reason of his troubles he had in Asia, as also in ÆGYPT. Howbeit newes being brought at length that Cafar was arrived at TARENTY M, and that he came by lande vnto BRYND VSI- C vm: Cicero departed thence to goe meete him, not miltrusting that Cafar woulde not pardon him, but rather being ashamed to come to his enemie being a conqueror, before such a number of men as he had about him. Yet he was not forced to doe or speake any thing vnseemely to his calling. For Cafar feeing him comming towardes him farre before the rest that came with him: he lighted from his horse and imbraced him, and walked a great way a soote with him, stil talking with him only, and euer after he did him great honor and made much of him. Infortuche as Cicero having written a booke in praise of Cato: Cafar on the other fide wrote an other, and praifed the eloquence and life of Cicero, matching it with the life of Pericles and Theramenes. Ciceroes booke was intituled Cato, & Cafars booke called Anticato, as much to fay, as against Cato. They say further, that Quintus Ligarius being accused to have bene in the field D against Casar, Cicero tooke vpon him to defend his cause: and that Casar sayd vnto his frendes

Cafar maruelously, he had so sweete a grace, and suche force in his words; that it is reported Guerret etaquenes, bow is Cafar chaunged divers colours, and shewed plainly by his countenance, that there was a maraltered Cefer, unlous alteracion in all the partes of him. For, in thend when the Orator came to touche the battell of Pharfalia, then was Cafar fo troubled, that his bodie shooke withall, and besides. certaine bookes he had fell out of his handes, and he was driven against his will to fet Ligarim at libertie. Afterwardes, when the common wealth of Rome came to be a kingdom, Ci-E sero leaving to practife any more in the state, he gave him selfe to reade Philosophie to the young men that came to heare him:by whose accesse vnto him(bicause they were the chiefest under Cefar. of the nobilitie in Rome) he came against to beare as great sway and authoritie in Rome, as euer he had done before. His studie and endeuour was, to wryte matters of Philosophie dialogue wife, and to translate out of Græke into Latin, taking paynes to bring all the Græke wordes, which are proper vnto logicke and naturall causes, vnto Latin. For he was the first man by report that gaue Latin names vnto these Græke words, which are proper vnto Philofophers, as, Φαιτασία, he termed, Vifio. Κατάθεσις Affenfus. Εποχί, Affenfus cohibitio. Καταλή Lis, Comprehensio. To atoucy Curpus individuum. To ausges Corpus simplex. To xever Vacuum, and many other fuche like wordes. But though he were not the first, yet was it he that most did deuise and vie F them, and turned some of them by translation, others into proper termes: so that at length they came to be well taken, knowen, and understanded of euerie man. And for his readinesse about him, what hurte is it for vs to heare Cicero speake, whome we have not heard of long time? For otherwife Ligarius (in my opinion) standeth already a condemned man, for I know him to be a vile man, and mine enemie. But when Cicero had begonne his Oration, he moued in wryting of verses, he would vie them many times for his recreation for it is reported, that when focuer he tooke in hand to make any he would dispatch five hundred of them in a nights Nowe, all that time of his recreacion and pleasure, he would commonly be at force of his houses in the contrie, which he had neero vnto Thise or Lym, from whence he would wryte vnto his frends, that he led Laertes life: either spoken merily as his maner was, or else pricked forward with ambition, defiring to returne againe to be a practifer in the common wealth, being wearie with the present time and state thereof. Howsoever it was, he came oftentimes to ROME, onely to see Cafar to keepe him his frend, and would ever be the first man to confirme any honors decreed vnto him, and was alwayes studious to vtter some newe matter to praise him and his doinges. As that was he fayd touching the flatues of Fomper, the which being onerthrowen, Cafar commaunded them to be fet up againe, and forther were. For Cicero fayd, that by that curtesie in setting vp of Pompeys statues againe, he did oftablishe his owne, So. Cicero being determined to wryte all the Romana historie, and to mingle with them many of the GRECIANS doings, adding thereunto all the fables and deutles which they doe write and reporte: he was hindered of his purpose against his will, by many open and private troubles that came you him at once: whereof notwithstanding he him selfe was cause of the most of them. For first of all, he did put away his wife Terentia, bicause the had made but small ac- cicerodid put compt of him in all the warres: fo that he departed from Roma having no necessarie thing and his vife with him to enterteine him out of his contrie, and yet when he came backe againe into I TA-

LIE, the neuer thewed any sparke of loue or good will towardes him. For the neuer came to BRUND VSIVM to him, where he remeyned a long time: and worse then that, his daughter having the hart to take folong a jorney in hand to goe to him, the neither gave her company to conduct her, nor money or other furniture convenient for her, but so handled the matter, that Civero at his returne to Rome founde bare walles in his house and nothing in it, and yet greatly brought in det besides. And these were the honestest causes alleaged for their dinorse. But besides that Terentia denved all these, Cicero him selfe gane her a good occasion to cleere her felfe, bicaufe he shortly after maried a young maiden, being fallen in fancie with her (as cieer maied Terentia fayd) for her beawtie: or, as Tyro his ferraunt wrote, for her riches, to thende that a young main with her goods he might pay his dets. For she was very rich, & Cicero also was appointed her den. gardian, the being left fole heire. Now, bicause he ought a maruelous summe of money, his

D parents and frends did counfell him to many this young maiden, notwithstanding he was too olde for her, bicause that with her goodes he might satisfie his creditors. But Antonius speaking of this mariage of Cicero, in his aunswers & Orations he made against the Philippians:

he doth reproue him for that he put away his wife, with whome he was growen olde, being merie with him by the way for that he had bene an idle man, and neuer went from the smoke of his chimney, nor had bene abroade in the warres in any feruice of his contrie or common wealth. Shortly after that he had maried his fecond wife, his daughter dyed in labor of child, in Lentulus house, whose seconde wife the was, being before maried vnto Pifo, who was her first husband. So the Philosophers and learned men came of all sides to comfort him: but he tooke her death so forowfully, that he put away his second wife, bicause he thought she did reioyce inge gathered together, euerie man was affrayed that the citie woulde againe fall into civill warres. And Antonius alfo, who was Conful at that time, did affemble the Senate, and made some speache and mocion then to draw things againe vnto quietnes. But Cicero having vsed vnto Brutus and Cassius some governmentes of provinces. Howbeit nothing was concluded:

drame of 0. one night that the Senators sonnes were called into the Capitoll, bicause supiter had appoinadopted some ted to shew them him, that one day should come to be Lord and king of Rome, and that the of lutin Ca- Romanes being desirous to see who it should be, ranne all vitto the temple: and that all the dainly the dores of the temple were open, & then that al the children rose one after an other, F & went and passed by the image of Iupiter, who looked vpon them all, and sent them discontented, fauing this young Cafar, vnto whom he put foorth his hand as he paffed by, and fayd:

for the people of them felues were forie, when they fawe Cafari bodie broughthrough the A market place. And when Antonias also did thew them his gowne all bebloodied, cut, & thrust through with fwordes: then they were like madde men for anger, and fought vp and downe the market place if they coulde meete with any of them that had flaine him; and taking fire brandes in their handes, they ranne to their houses to fer them a fire, But the conspirators hauing preuented this daunger, faued them selves; and searing that if they taried at Rome, they should have many such alaroms, they for sooke the citie. Then Antonine began to looke aloft. and became fearefull to all men, as though he ment to make him felfe king; but yet most of all vnto Cicero, aboue all others. For Antonius perceiping that Cicero began againe to increase in credit and authoritie, and knowing that he was Brutus very frend; he did millike to fee him come neere him, and befides, there was at that time fome gealoufie between them, for the B diverfitie and difference of their manners and disposicions. Gicero being affrayed of this, was foorthwith to Rome, not being deceived in his first hope. For there came such a number of first of all in minde to go with Dolabella, to his prouince of Stria, as one of his Lieutenaunts. But they that were appointed to be Confuls the next yeare following after Antonius, two noble citizens, & Ciceroes great frends, Hircine, & Panfa: they intreated him not to forfake them. vndertaking that they would plucke downe this ouergreat power of Antonius, so he would remaine with them. But Cicero, neither beleuing nor altogether mistrusting them, for fooke Dolabella, and promised Hircius and Pansa, that he would spend the sommer at ATHENS, and that he would return again to Rome fo foone as they were entred into their Confulthip, With ciero faileth this determination Ciero tooke fea alone, to goe into GRECE. But as it chaunceth oftentimes, there was some let that kept him he could not faile, and newes came to him daily from C Rome, as the manner is, that Antonius was wonderfully chaunged, and that nowe he did nothing any more without the authoritie & confent of the Senate, & that there lacked no thing people out to meete him, that he coulde doe nothing all day long, but take them by the handes, and imbrace them: who to honor him, came to meete him at the gate of the citie, as also by the way to bring him to his house. The next morning Antonius affembled the Senate. and called for Cicero by name. Cicero refused to goe, and kept his bedde, fayning that he was werie with his iorney and paines he had taken the day before : but in deede, the cause why he went not, was, for feare and suspicion of an ambushe that was layed for him by the way, if he D had gone, as he was informed by one of his verie good frends. Antonius was marueloufly offended that they did wrongfully accuse him, for laying of any ambush for him: and therefore fent fouldiers to his house, and commaunded them to bring him by force, or else to fette his house a fire. After that time, Cicero and he were alwayes at iarre, but yet coldly enough, one of them taking heede of an other: vntill that the young Cafar returning from the citie of A-POLLONIA, came as lawfull heire vnto Iulius Cafar Dictator, and had contencion with Antonius for the summe of two thowsande fine hundred Myriades, the which Antonius kept in his cicero and 0- handes of his fathers goodes. Thereuppon, Philip who had maried the mother of this young C.efar, and Marcellus, who had also maried his fifter, went with young Cafar vnto Cicero, and there agreed together, that Cicero should helpe young Casar with the fauour of his authoritic, E and eloquence, as well towardes the Senate, as also to the people: and that Casar in recompence of his good will should stande by Cicero, with his money and souldiers. For this young Cafar, had many of his fathers old fouldiers about him, that had ferued under him. Now there was an other cause that made Cicero glad to imbrace the frendshippe of this young Casar, and that was this. Whilest Pompey and Iulius Cafar were aline, and in good case: Cicero dreamed children likewise were waiting there in their goodly garded gownes of purple, vntill that so-

My Lordes of Rome, this childe is he that shall end all your civil warres, when he commeth to be Lord of Rome. Some fay, that Givero had this vision in his dreame, and that he caried in good memory the looke of this child, howbeit that he knew him not : and that the next morning he went of purpose into the fielde of Mars, where these young boyes did exercise them felues, who, when he came thither, had broken up from playing, and were going home, and that amongest them he first saw him whom he had dreamed of, and knew him verie well, and muling at him the more, asked him whole fonne he was. The boy aunswered, that he was the fonne of one Offauius, (a man otherwife of no great calling) & of Accia, the fifter of Iulius Ca- Offauius, and far: who having no childe, made him his heire by his last will and testament, and left him all Accianthe pahis landes and goodes. After that time, it is reported, that Cicero was verie glad to speake to will Cafe.

he called him father. But Brutus being offended with him for it, in his Epistells he wrote vnto

D practifed by honors and gifts to call the armies from him, which he had about him, and so to minish the greatnes of his power: saying, that their contrie now stoode in no neede offorce,

R him when he met with him, and that the boy also liked Ciceroes frendshippe, and making of him: for by good happe the boy was borne the fame yeare that Cicero was Conful. And these Octaving Co. be the reasons alleaged, why Cicero did fauor this young Cafar, But in truth, first of all the great for was borne malice he bare vnto Antonius, and secondly his nature that was ambitious of honor, were (in Cicerost Conmy opinion) the chiefest causes why he became young Casars frend : knowing that the force sufficient and power of his fouldiers, would greatly strengthen his authority and countenance in manedging the affaires of the state, besides that the young man coulde flatter him so well, that

Atticus, he sharply reproueth Cicero, faying, that for feare of Antonius he flattered this young Cafar: whereby it appeared, he did not so much seeke for the libertie of Rome, as he did procure him felfe a louing and gentle maifter. This notwithstanding, Brutus brought with him Cueroes sonne that studied Philosophie at ATHENS, and gave him charge of men vnder him, and imployed him in great affaires, wherein he shewed him selfe verie forward, and valliant. Now Ciceroes authoritie and power grew againe to be so great in Romb, as euer it was before. Ciceroes grew For he did what he thought good, and so vexed Antonius, that he draue him out of the citie, Power as and fent the two Confuls Hircius and Panla against him, to fight with him: and caused the Senate also to decree, that young Casar should have sergeaunts to carie roddes and axes before him, and all other furniture for a Prætor, as a man that fighteth for his contry. After that Antonius had lost the battell, and that both the Consuls were flaine, both the armies came vnto Cafar. The Senate then being affraied of this young man, that had so great good fortune, they nor feare of defence, fith her enemie Antonius was fled and gone. Cafar fearing this, fent men fecretly vnto Cicero, to pray him to procure that they two together might be chosen Consuls, Officialise Caand that when they thould be in office, he should doe and appoint what he thought good, ha- far such to be uing the young man at his commaundement, who defired no more but the honor only of the name, Cafar him felfe confessed afterwardes, that being affrayed he should have bene viterly cast away, to have bene left alone: he finely served his turne by Ciceroes ambition, having perfwaded him to require the Confulship, through the helpe and affistance that he would geue him. But there was Cicero finely colted, as old as he was, by a young man, when he was conretented to fue for the Confulthin in his behalfe, and to make the Senate agreable to it: wherefore his frendes presently reproued him for it, and shortly after he perceived he had vndone him selfe, and together also lost the libertie of his contrie. For this young man Octavius Ca(ar being growen to be verie great by his meanes and procurement: when he saw that he had the Confulthippe vpon him, he for fooke Cicero, and agreed with Antonius and Lepidus. Then Offenius Ceioyning his armie with theirs, he deuided the Empire of Rome with them, as if it had bene for forfaketh lands left in common betwene them: and besides that, there was a bill made of two hundred Note the ficmen and yowards, whom they had appointed to be flaine. But the greatest difficultie and dif-kelnes of ference that fell out between them, was about the outlawing of Cicero. For Antonius woulde youth, hearken to no peace betwene them, vnlesse Cicero were slaine first of all : Lepidus was also in of the Trism F the fame mind with Antonius: but Cafar was against them both. Their meeting was by the ci- wiri: Antotieof BOLONIA, where they continued three dayes together, they three only fecretly confulting in a place environned about with a litle river. the two first daves, but at the third, that he yeelded and for fooke him. The exchaunge they a. A greed voon betwene them, was this. Cafar forfooke Cicero: Lepidus, his owne brother Paulus. and Antonius, Lucius Cafar, his vncle by the mothers fide. Such place tooke wrath in them, as they regarded no kinred nor blood, and to speake more properly, they shewed that no brute or fauage beaft is fo cruell as man, if with his licentiousnes he haue liberty to execute his will. While these matters were a brewing. Cicero was at a house of his in the contrie, by the city of THYSCYLV M, hauing at home with him also his brother Quintus Cicero. Newes being brought them thither of these proscriptions or outlawries, appointing men to be slaine: they determined to goe to Astyra, a place by the sea side where Cicero had an other house, there to take fea, and from thence to goe into MACED ON VINTO Brutus. For there ran a rumor that Brutus was verie strong, and had a great power. So, they caused them selues to be conueyed thither B in two litters, both of them being so weake with sorow and griese, that they could not otherwife have gone their wayes. As they were on their waye, both their litters going as neere to ech other as they could, they bewailed their miserable estate: but Quintus chiefly, who tooke it most grieuously. For, remembring that he tooke no money with him when he came from his house, and that Cicero his brother also had verie litle for him selfe: he thought it best that

C But Mareus Tullius Cicero being caried vnto Asty RA, and there finding a shippe readie, imbarked immediatly, and fayled alongest the coast vnto mount Circe, hauing a good gale of winde. There the mariners determining forthwith to make fayle againe, he came a shore, cither for feare of the fea, or for that he had some hope that Casar had not altogether for saken him: and therewithall returning towardes Rome by lande, he had gone about a hundred furlong thence. But then being at a straight howe to resolue, and sodainly chaunging his minde: he wouldeneedes be caried backe againe to the fea, where he continued all night maruelous forowfull, and full of thoughts. For one while he was in minde to goe fecretly vnto Octavius as he was, he put him felfe againe into his feruauntes handes, to be conveyed by fea to an other place called * CAPITES. There he had a very proper pleafaunt fommer house, where the read Caiese. North winds, called Etelia, doe geue a trimme fresh aver in the sommer season. In that place also there is a litle temple dedicated vnto Apollo, not farre from the sea side. From thence there came a great shole of crowes, making a maruelous noyse, that came flying towardes Ciceroes matter fore-(bexed by shippe, which rowed vpon the shore side. This shole of crowes came and lighted vpon the yard of their faile, some crying, and some pecking the cords with their bills: so that enery man judged straight, that this was a signe of ill lucke at hand. Cieero notwithstanding this, camea crowes rate Cicero. shore, and went into his house, and layed him downe to see if he couldesseepe. But the most E parte of these crowes came and lighted upon the chamber windowe where he lay, making a wonderfull great noyle: and some of them got vnto Ciceroes bedde where he lay, the clothes being cast ouer his head, and they neuer left him, till by litle and litle they had with their bills pluckt of the clothes that couered his face. His men feeing that, & faying to them felues that they were too vile beafts, if they would tarie to fee their maister flaine before their eyes, considering that brute beafts had care to faue his life, feeing him to vinworthily intreated, and that they should not doe the best they coulde to faue his life: partely by intreatie, and partely by force, they put him againe into his litter to carie him to the fea. But in the meane time came Herennius the murderers appointed to kill him, Herennius a Centurion, and Popilius Lana, Tribune of the fouldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thowfande men, whose cause Cicero had once pleaded before F the Iudges, when he was accused for the murther of his owne father) having fouldiers attending vpon them. So Ciceroes gate being thut, they entred the house by force, and missing him, they asked them of the house what was become of thim. They auniwered they could not tell. Howbeitthere was a youngboy in the houle called Fhilologie, a flaue infranchifed by Quintus Cicero, whom Tullius Cicero had brought win the Latingongue, and had taught him the liberall sciences: he told this Herennius, that his servauntes carried him in a litter towards the sea. through darke narrowe lanes, shadowed with woode or either fide: Powing the Colonell taking some souldiers with him, tanne about on the outline of the lanesty comments and Herennius on thother side entrouve lanes. For so did Giero call the Orations hewidge against him, for the malice he bare him : & do yet continue the same name vitill this at sleet time. When these poore dismembred members were brought to Romes Antonius by thatince was bufily occupied at that time about the election of certaine officers; who will make at a of them & faw them, he cried out alowde that now all his outlawries and profesioning were executed: and thereuppon commaunded his head and his hands should straight be let vp ouer the pul- cierres had pit for Orations, in the place called Roftra. Demofibenes eloquence

His is as muche as we could gather by our knowledge touching the A Demofthenes . Furthermore , leaving the comparison a fide of the difference of their eloquence in their Orations : me thinkes I may fay thus muche of them. That Demostheres did whollie imploy all his win and learning (naturall or artificiall) vnto the arte of Rethoricke, and that in force; and vertue of eloquence, he did excell all the Orators in his time and for grauetie and magnificent ftyle, all those also that onhis time and for grauette and magnine the profile and arte, all the ly wryte for theme or often and for tharpnesse and generalite learned in all

Sophisters and Maisters of Rethoricke. And that Cicero was a man generallie learned in all sciences, and that had studied divers bookes, as appeareth plainely by the sundrie bookes of B Philosophie of his owne making, written after the manner of the Academicke Philosophers. Furthermore, they may see in his Orations he wrote in certeine causes to serue him when he pleaded: that he fought occasions in his bytalke to shewe men that he was excellently well learned. Furthermore, by their phrases a man may discerne some sparke of their manners and condicions, For Demosthenes phrase hath no maner of finenesse, geatles, nor grace in it, bur is altogether graue and harshe, and smelleth not of the lampe, as Pytheas sayd when he mocked him: but sheweth a great drinker of water, extreame paines, and there with also a sharpe and fower nature. But Cicero oftentimes fell from pleasaunt tawntes, vnto plaine scurrilitie: and turning all his pleadinges of matters of importaunce, to sporte and laughter, having a grace in it, many times he did forget the comlynesse that became a man of his calling. As in his O- C ration for Calius, where he fayeth, it is no maruell if in so greate aboundance of wealth and finenesse he giue him selse a litle to take his pleasure; and that it was a folly not to vse pleasures lawefull, and tollerable, fith the famousest Philosophers that euer were, did place the chiefe felicitie of man, to be in pleasure. And it is reported also, that Marcus Cato having accused Murana, Cicero being Conful, defended his cause, and in his Oration pleasauntly girded all the sect of the Stoicke Philosophers for Catoes sake, for the straunge opinions they holde, which they call Paradoxes: infomuch as he made all the people and Judges also fall a laughing a good . And Cato him felfe also smiling a litle, fayd vnto them that fate by him : what a laughing and mocking Conful haue we, my Lordes ? but letting that passe, it seemeth that Cieero was of a pleasaunt and merie nature: for his face shewed euer greate life and mirth in it. D Whereas in Demosthenes countenaunce on thother fide, they might discerne a maruelous diligence & care, and a penfine man, neuer weary with paine: infomuch that his enemies, (as he reporteth him selfe) called him a peruerse & froward man. Furthermore, in their writings

A is different, that the one speaketh modestly in his owne praise, so as no man can justly be of. Demosthant fended with him : and yet not alwayes, but when necessitie enforceth him for some matter of making of great importaunce, but otherwise verie discreete and modest to speake of him selfe. Citero in him selfei contrarie maner, ving too often repeticion of one felfe thing in all his Orations, shewed an efformation extreame ambition of glorie, when inceffantly he cried out:

Let speare and shield gene place to governe, And geue the tung the laurell Crowne.

Yea furthermore, he did not onely praise his owne actes and deedes, but the Orations als fo which he had wrytten or pleaded: as if he shoulde have contended against Isocrates, or Anaximenes, a maister that taught Rethoricke, and not to goe about to reforme the people of

quence: fo, to couet the praise of his owne glorious tongue, or as it were to begge it, that sheweth a base minde. And therefore in this poynt we must confesse that Demosthenes is farre grauer, and of a nobler minde: who declared him felfe, that all his eloquence came onely but by practife, the which also required the fauor of his auditorie: and further, he thought them fooles and madde men (as in deede they be no leffe) that therefore woulde make any boaft of them selves. In this they were both alike, that both of them had great credit and authoritie Demosthmen C in their Orations to the people, and for obtayning that they would propound: Infomuche as small cite errors in their Orations to the people, and for obtayning that they would propound: Captaines, and they that had armies in their handes, stoode in neede of their eloquence. As their Ora-Chares, Diopithes, and Leosthenes, they all were holpen of Demosthenes: and Pompey, and Otta- sions in the wins Cafar the young man, of Cicero: as Cafar him felfe confesseth in his Commentaries he wrote vnto Agrippa, and Macenas. But nothing sheweth a mans nature and condicion more, Authoritis (as it is reported, and so is it true) then when one is in authoritie: for that bewrayeth his humor, and the affections of his minde, and layeth open also all his secret vices in him. Demo-vices. thenes coulde neuer deliuer any suche proofe of him selfe, bicause he neuer bare any office, nor was called forward. For he was not Generall of the armie, which he him felfe had prepared against king Philippe. Cicero on thother side being sent Treasorer into Sicile, and Pro- cicero at-D consul into CILICIA and CAPPADOCIA, in such a time as couetousnes raigned most: (info-finence from much that the Captaines & Gouernors whom they fent to gouerne their provinces, thinking it villanie and dastardlinesse to robbe, did violently take thinges by force, at what time also to take bribes was reckoned no shame, but to handle it discreetly, he was the better thought of, and beloued for it) he shewed plainely that he regarded not money, and gaue foorth many proofes of his curtesie and goodnes. Furthermore, Cicero being created Conful by name, but Dictator in deede, having absolute power and authoritie over all thinges to suppresse the rebellion and conspirators of Catiline: he proued Platoes prophecie true, which was: That the cities are fafe from daunger, when the chiefe Magistrates and Gouernors (by some good diuine fortune) doe gouerne with wiledom and iustice. Demosthenes was reproued for his cor-E tuption, and felling of his eloquence: bicause secretly he wrote one Oration for Phormio, and an other in the selfe same matter for Apollodorus, they being both aduersaries. Further he was saker. defamed also for receiving money of the king of Phrsia, and therewithall condemned for the money which he had taken of Harpalus. And though some peraduenture woulde obiect, that the reporters thereof (which are many) doe lye: yet they can not possibly deny this that Demosthenes had no power to refraine from looking of the presentes which divers kinges did offer him, praying him to accept them in good parte for their fakes: neither was that the part of a man that did take vsurie by trafficke on the sea, the extreamest yet of all other. In contrariemaner (as we haue fayd before) it is certeine that Cicero being Treasorer, refused the gifts which the Sicilians offered him, there : and the presentes also which the king of the CAP-

F PADOCIANS offred him whilest he was Proconsul in CILICIA, and those especially which his frendes pressed upon him to take of them, being a great summe of money, when he went as a banished man out of Rome. Furthermore, the banishment of the one was infamous to him, Divers confer bicause by judgement he was banished as a theese. The banishment of the other was for as A of the banish honorable an acte as ever he did, being banished for ridding his contrie of wicked men. And moffhenes and therefore of Demosthenes, there was no speeche after he was gone: but for Cicero, all the Senate chaunged their apparell into blacke, and determined that they would passe no decree by their authoritie, before Ciceroes banishment was reuoked by the people. In deede Cicero idlely passed his time of banishment, and did nothing all the while he was in MACED ON: and one of the chiefest acts that Demosthenes did, in all the time that he delt in the affaires of the common wealth, was in his banishment. For he went vnto enery city, and did affist the Ambassadors of the GRECIANS. and refused the Ambassadors of the MACED ONIANS. In the which he shewed him selfe a better citizen, then either Themistocles, or Alcibiades, in their like fortune and exile. So when he was called home, and returned, he fell againe to his old trade which he B practifed before, and was euer against Antipater, and the MACED ONIANS. Where Lalius in open Senate sharply tooke vp Cicero, for that he fate still and fayd nothing, when that Octavius Cafar the young man made peticion against the law, that he might sue for the Consulshippe. and being so young, that he had never a heare on his face. And Brutus selfe also doth greatly reproue Cicero in his letters, for that he had maintained and nourished, a more grieuous and greater tyrannie, then that which they had put downe. And last of all, me thinketh the death of Cicero most pitiefull, to see an olde man caried vp and downe, (with tender loue of his seruauntes) feeking all the waies that might be to flie death, which did not long preuent his naturall course: and in the ende, olde as he was, to see his head so pitiefully cut of. Whereas Demosthenes, though he yeelded a litle, intreating him that came to take him : yet for that he had C prepared the poylon long before, that he had kept it long, and also vied it as he did, he can not but be maruelously commended for it. For fith the god Neptune denved him the benefit of his fanctuarie, he betooke him to a greater, and that was death: whereby he faued him felfe out of the fouldiers handes of the tyran, and also scorned the bloody crueltic of Antipater.

Demetrius.

Ho first likened arts to our sences, semeth to have respected especially Hos sences that one property of them both, in receiving objects of contrary qua- and arees doe lity: for, in the vie & end of their operacion, there is great difference. The senses receive indifferently, without discretion and judgement, white and blacke, fweete and fower, foft and hard : for their office is only to admit their feuerall objects, and to carie and referre the judge-

He thought that being in a goodly great fielde, he sowed of these ferapinges of gold, and that of that feede, first of all came vp goodly wheate which had eares of gold: howbeit that shortly after returning that way againe, he found nothing but the straw, and the cares of the wheate cut of, and that he being angrie and verie for it, some tolde F him that Mithridates had cut of these golden eares of wheate, and had caried them with him into the realme of Ponr. Amigonus being maruelofly troubled with this dreame, after he had

But also in their ende there was no great difference, thone brought to his death by his mortal enemies, at the others fortune normuch vnlike. But now to our histo-

rie. Antigonus had two fonnes by his wife Stratonic, the daughter of Corraus, the one of them he named Demetrius, and the other Philip aftering fathers name. Thus farre the most wrvters doe agree : howbeit some holde opinion, that Demetrius was not the sonne of Antigonus. but his Nephewe. But bleause his father dyed leaving him a childe, and that his mother was straight maried againe vito Antigonus: thereuppon camerhe reporte that he was Antigonus fonne. Howfocuer it was, Philip, that was not much younger then Demetrius, dved. Now for Demetries, though he was a verie bigge man, he was nothing to high as his father, but yet to B passing and wonderfull faver, that no painter could possibly draw his picture and counterfeat

For they faw a sweete countenance, mixed with a kinde of grauetie in his face. a feare with curtefic, and in incomparable Princely maiestic accompanied with a lively spirit and youth, and his wit and manners were fuch, that they were both fearefull, and pleafaunt vnto men that frequented him. For as he was most pleasaunt in company having leasure and most genen to banketing, pleasaunt life, and more wantonly genen to follow any lust and pleafure, than any king that euer was: yet was he alwayes very carefull & diligent in dispatching matters of importance. And therefore he maruelously commended, and also endeuoured to follow Dionylius, (as much to fay, as Bacchus) aboue all the other goddes, as he that had bene a wife and valliant Captaine in warre, and that in peace invented and vsed all the pleasure that & might be. He maruelously loued and reuerenced his father, and it seemeth that the dutieful-

And for proofe hereof we read, that one day as he came home from hunting, he went vnto his father Antigonus, gening audience to certaine Ambassadors, and after he had done his duetie to him, and kiffed him: he fate downe by him even as he came from hunting, having his dartes in his hande, which he caried out a hunting with him. Then Antigonus calling the Ambassadors allowed as they went their way, having received their aunswere: my Lords, sayd he, you shall carie home this reporte of my sonne and me, be witnesses I pray you, how we liue one with an other. As meaning to shewe thereby, that the agreement between the father and the D

So that the greatest Prince and most auncientest of all the successors of Alexander, boasted that he stoode not in feare of his sonne, but did suffer him to sitte by him, having a dart in his hand, So was this house onely of all other the MACEDONIAN kinges, least defiled with suche villanie, many successions after: and to consesse a troth, in all Antigonus rase there was not one, but Philip onely, that flue his owne sonne. But we have many examples of divers other houses of kinges, that have put their sonnes, wives, and mothers to death: and for their brethren, it was an ordinarie thing with them to kill them, and neuer flicke at it. For like as Geometricians would have men graunt them certaine proposicions which they suppose without E proofe: euen so was this holden for a generall rule, to kill their brethren, for the safetie of their estate. But further, to showe you more plainly that Demetrius was of a noble and curteous nature, and that he dearely loued his frendes: we may alleage this example. Mithridates, the fonne of Ariobarzanes, was his familiar frend and companion (for they were both in maner of made his fonne sweare vnto him that he would make no man aliue priuv to that he would tell Wint he told him all his dreame what he had dreamed and therewith that he was determined to purthis young man Mithridates to death . Demetrius was marticlous fory for mand therefore the next morning, this young noble Prince going as he was wont to paffe the time away with Mithridates he durft not by word of mouth viter that he knew bicaufe of his other how heit taking him afide from his other familliers, when they were both together by them fellies,

For he conquered many goodly familiar up. contries, and it was he onely that established the house of the kingdom of Power the which Mithridates the ROMANES afterwardes ouerthewe, about the eight fuccession. By these examples we may king of Ponto easily conjecture the good nature and curtefie of Demetrius. For like as the elements (according to Empedorles opinion) are ever at * ftrife together, but specially those that are hearest * Bicante he eache to other even fo, though all the fuccessors of Alexander were at continual warres to Jayd, that love gether, yet was it foonest kindled, and most cruell betwene them which bordeted nearest vn. were ever the rocche other, and that by being neare neighbours, had alwaies occasion of brawle together, efficient canas fell out at that time betwene Antigonus and Ptolomy. Demetrius receiving them at his handes, belought the gods that he might not long fulnes of Pto-D liue a debter vnto Ptolomy for this great curtefie, but that he might quickly requite it with the like againe. Now Demetrius tooke not this ouerthrow like a young man, though it was his first Demetrius fouldierfare: but like an olde and wife Captaine, that had abidden many overthrowes, he vfed great diligence to gather men againe, to make new armors, and to keepe the cities & contries in his hands under obedience, and did traine and exercise his souldiers in armes, whome he had gathered togither. gaine, he came and conquered it without other ayde then of him felfe: and went with a great armie against the people and nations confining vpon the INDIAN s, and the provinces adiovning vnto mount Caucasus, to conquer them. Thereuppon Demetrius hoping to find Maso-POTAMIA without any gard or defence, sodainly passed ouer the river of Euphrates, & came vnlooked for vnto BABYLON, and there diftreffed the garrison of Selenem, that keptone of the castells or citadells of the citie, being two of them: and then putting in seuen thowsand soul. B diers to keepe them, he commaunded the reft of his men to get what they could, & to bringe it away with them. After that, he marched towards the fea to returne home, leaving thereby the Realme and kingdom of Seleucus in better state and safetie, then it was when he inuaded it. For it appeared that he had taken all the contry from Seleucus, leaving him nothing in it. by spoiling and forraging all that was there. At his returne home, newes were brought him that Ptolomy lay at the leege of the citie of HALYCARNASSYS: whereuppon he drew thither with Antigoniu & speede to make him raise the seege, and thereby saued the city from him, Now, bicause by this exployte they wanne great fame, both of them, (Antigonus and Demetrius) fell into a maruelous desire to set all GR ECE at libertie, the which Ptolomy and Cassander kept in seruitude and bondage. Neuer king tooke in hande a more honorable nor infter warre and enterprise, then C that was. For, what power or riches he could gather together, in oppressing of the barbarous people: he bestowed it all in restoring the GRECIANS to their libertie, and onely to winne fame and honor by it. So, they being in confultacion what way to take, to bring their purpose and defire to passe, and having taken order to begin first at ATHENS: one of Antigonus chiefest friends about him, told him that he should take the citie, and place a good garrison there for them selues, if they could once winne it: for, said he, it will be a good bridge to passe further into all GR ECE. Antigonus would not harken to that, but faid, that the loue and good will of men was a furer bridge, & that the citie of A THENS was as a beacon to all the land, the which would immediatly make his doings shine through the world, as a cresset light, ypon the toppe of a kepe or watche tower. Thus Demetrius hoysed sayle, having five thowsand silver talents, D and a fleete of two hundred and fiftie fayle, and failed towardes the citie of Athens: in the which Demetrius PHALERIAN was gouernor in the behalfe of Cassander, & kept a great strong garrison there within the hauen and castell of MVNICHEA. He had an excellent good winde to further his iorney, so that with his good foresight and speede he made, he arrived in the hauen of PIR & A, the five and twenty day of the moneth Thargelion, (now called Maye) before any man knew of his comming. Now when this fleete was within a kenning of the citie, and lesse, that they might easily see them from thence: euery man prepared him selse to receive them, taking them to be Ptolomyes shippes. But in fine, the Captaines and gouernors ynderstanding too late who they were, did what they could to helpe them selves: but they were all in hurly burly, as men compelled to fight out of order, to keepe their enemies from landing, E and to repulse them, comming so sodainly vpon them. Demetrius having found the barre of the hauen open, launched in prefently. Then being comen to the view of them all, & standing vpon the hatches of his galley, he made fignes with his hand that he prayed filence. The tumult being pacified, he proclaymed alowed by one of his Heraulds, that his father had fenthim in happy hower to deliuer the ATHENIANS from all their garrisons, and to restore them againe to their auncient libertie and freedom, to enjoye their lawes and auncient gouernment of their forefathers. After the proclamacion made, all the common people straight threwe downe their weapons and targets at their feete, to clappe their handes with great showtes of ioy : praying him to land, and calling him alowde their Sauior, and benefactor. In the meane season bicause he would not be idle, he hoysed sayle, and coafted towards the citie of MBGARA, within the which Caffander also kept a strong garrison.

B Demetrius bufily following these matters, was advertised that Cratesipolis, surnamed Polyperchon (who had bene Alexanders wife) a Lady of passing fame and beauty, and lay at that time in the citie of PATRAS, would be glad to fee him: he leauing his armie within the territorie of the Magarians, tooke his iorney presently vnto her, with a few of his lightest armed men, and yet he stale from them, and made his tent to be set vp a good way from them, bicause this Ladie might not be seene when the came vnto him. After that, the citie of MEGARA was taken and won from Cassanders men, Dementus where Demetrius fouldiers would have facked all: howbeitthe Athenians made humble city of Megainterceffion for them, that they might not be spoyled. the intreatie and earnest desire of the ATHENIANS, who prayed him to come and refresh him felfe in their citie: he made his entry into it, and caused all the people to affemble, and then pemeritares reflored vnto them their auncient lawes and libertie of their contry, promising them besides, foreth the Ac that he would procure his father to fende them a hundred and fiftye thowfand busshells of their last of wheate, and as much woode and tymber as should serve to make them a hundred and fiftie liberise. gallies. Thus, the ATHENIANS through Demetrius meanes, recoursed the Democratia again. Democratian (to wit, their populer gouernment) fifteene yeares after they had loft it, and liued all the time

But by this meanes they made their fauior and preserver of their contry, Demetrius (who seemed to have obteined such honor and glory through his goodnes and liberalitie) hateful and odious to all men, for the ouergreat and vnmeasurable honors which they gaue him. For first decreed of all, they called Antigonus and Demetrius kings, who before that time had alwayes refused to Demetrius the name, and the which, (among all other princely honors and prerogatives graunted) they by the Athe-

And last of all, they chaunged the name of the moneth Munichion (to wit E the moneth of Ianuary) and called it Demetrion: and the last day of the moneth which they called before the new and old moone, they then called it the Demetriade: and the feaftes of Bacchus also called then Dionysia, they presently named Demetria. But the goddes by divers fignes and tokens shewed plainly, that they were offended with these chaunges and alteracions. choke up the hauen mouth being but narrowe, so that none of the gallies that were within could come our: and furthermore; he disperfed his armie by land vpon the foreland poyut 6 which reacheinto the fea, and went him felfe into the maine fea with nyne score gallies, and gaue such a sierce charge vpon Ptolomy, that he valliantly made him sie. Who when he sawe his armie broken, fled as speedily as he could with eight gallies onely: for all the rest were significant. ther broken or funcke in fight; and those eight onely escaped, besides three score and sense which were taken, and all their fouldiers in them. And as for his cariage, his traine, his friends, his officers; and houshold feruaunts, his wines, his gold and filter, his armor, engines of batterie, and all fuch other warlike furniture and munition as was conneved abourd his carects and great (hippes riding at anker: of all these things nothing escaped Demetrius hands, but all was brought into his campe. Among those spoyles also was taken that famous Curtisan Lamia. who at the first had her name onely, for her passing playing vpon the flute: but after the fellio D Curtifan trade, lier countenance and credit increased the more. So that euen then when her beautie through yeares fell to decaye, and that the found Demetrius much younger then been felfe : yet the fo wanne him with her fweete connerfation and good grace, that he onely liked her, and all the other women liked him. After this victorie by fea, Menelaus made no morege Salamina yel- fiftance, but yeelded up SALAMINA & his shippes unto Demetrius, and put into his handes alfo twelue hundred horsemen, and twelue thowsand sootemen well armed. This so samous & triumphant victorie was yet much more beautified, by Demetrius great bountie and goodnes which he shewed in giuing his enemies slaine in battell honorable funeralls, setting the prison ners at liberty without ranfom paying, and giving moreover twelve hundred complet armors vnto the Athenians. After this, Demetrius sent Aristodemus MILESIAN vnto his father Antigonus, to tell him by word of mouth the newes of this victorie. Aristodemus was the greatest flatterer in all Antigonus Court, who deuised then, as it seemeth to me, to addevnto this exployte the greatest slatterie possible. For when he had taken land after he was come out of the lle of Cyprvs, he would in no wife have the shippe he came in to come neare the shoare, but commaunded them to ride at anker, and no man so hardy to leave the shippe: but he himself got into a litle boate, and went vnto Antigonus, who all this while was in maruelous feare and perplexitie for the successe of this battell, as men may easily judge they are, which hope after to great incertainties. Now when worde was brought him that Aristodemus was comming to him all alone, then was he worse troubled than afore, insomuch that he could scant keeps within dores him felfe, but fent his feruaunts and friends one after another to meete Arillote. F. mus, to aske him what newes, and to bring him worde presently againe how the world went, But not one of them could get any thing out of him, for he went on still fayer and fostly wan

a fad countenance, and very demurely, speaking neuer a worde. Wherefore Antigonus hare being cold in his belly, he could fray no lenger, but would him felfe goe and meete with Arifodemus at the gate, who had a maruelous preasse of people following on him, besides those of the Court which ranne out to heare his auni wer. At length when he came neare vnto Anmeonus, holding out his right hand vnto him, he cryed out aloved, God faue thee, O king Antigonus; we have overcome king Ptolomy in battell by fea, and have wonne the Realme of CYPR V S, with fixteene thowfand and eyght hundred prisoners. Then aunswered Antigonus, and God faue thee to: Truely Aristodemus thou hast kept vs in a trawnse a good while, but to munishe thee for the payne thou hast put vs to, thou shalt the later receive the reward of thy good newes. Then was the first time that the people with a lowde voice called Antigonus and The full time

Demetrius kings. Now for Antigonus, his friendes and familliers did at that present instant pur Demenius on the royall band or diadeame uppon his heade: But for Demetrius, his father fent it vnto, were called him, and by his letters called him king. They also that were in A GYPT with Ptolomy, under-kinger. flanding that, did also call and falute him by the name of king; bicause it shoulde not seeme that for one ouerthrowe received, their hartes were deade. Thus this ambition by icloufic & emulation, went from man to man to all Alexander's fuccessours. For Lysimachus then also befor before that tyme, he delt in matters with the barbarous people as a king. But Callander, though others wrote them selves kinges, he onely subscribed after his wonted manner. Now this was not onely an increase of a newename, or chaunging of apparell, but it was such an C honor, as it lyft up their hartes, and made them fland upon them felues: and befides it fo framed their manner of life and conversation with men, that they grewe more prowd and stately, then ever they were before: like vnto common players of tragedies, who apparelling them selues to playe their partes upon the stage, doe chaunge their gate, their countenaunce, their voyce, their manner of fitting at the table, and their talke also. So that afterwards they grew more cruell in commaunding their fubicats, when they had once taken away the vifer and

diffimulation of their absolute power, which before made them farre more lowly and gentle in many matters vnto them. And all this came through one vile flatterer, that brought fuch Notesbefore a wonderfull chaunge in the worlde. Antigonus therefore puffed vp with the glory of the vi- of flattery by ctorie of his sonne Demetrius, for the conquest of Cypris: he determined forthwith toset Milesen D voon Ptolomy. Him selfe led the armie by land, having his sonne Demetrius still rowing by the Anigonus & shore side with a great sleete of shippes. But one of his familliers called Medius, being asleepe Demenius had a vision one night that told him, what should be the ende and successe of this iorney. He Profession thought he sawe Antigonus ronne with all his armie who should have the vpper hande, and Medine that at the first he ranne with great force and swiftnes: but that afterwardes his strength and dreame. breath fayled him fo much, that when he should returne, he had scant any poulse or breath, and with much adoe retyred agayne. And even foit chaunced vnto him. For Antigonus by land, was eftfoones in great daunger: and Demetrius also by sea was often in hazard to leave the coast, and by storme and weather to be cast into places, where was nether hauen, creekes. nor harbarough for his shippes. And at length, having lost a great number of his shippes. he was driven to returne without any attempt given . Nowe Antigonus was at that tyme litle leffe then foure fcore yeare olde, but yet his fatte and corpulent bodie was more combersom to him then his yeares: therefore beeing growen vnmeete for warres, he vied his fonne in his place. Who for that he was fortunate, as also skilfull through the experience he had gotten, did wisely gouerne the waightiest matters. His father besides did not passe for his youthfull partes, lauishe expences, and common dronkennes he gaue him selfe vnto. For in tyme of peace, he was given over to all those vices: but in tyme of warre, he was as sober and continent, as any man so borne by nature. And therefore it is reported, that Lamis beeing manifestly knowen to be Mystresse ouer him, one daye when he was come from hunting, he came (as his manner was) to kiffe his father; and that Antigonus finyling vpon him fayde what howe now Sonne, doest thou thinke thou art kissing of Lamia? Another tyme

Demetrius was many dayes together drinking and ryoting, and fawe not his father: and then to excuse him selfe vnto him, he tolde him he had gotten a rewme that made him keepe his chamber, that he could not come to him . So I heard fayde Antigonus: but was it of Tua- A sos or Chios, that rewme? he spake it, bicause that in either of those two Ilands, there were excellent good wines. Another tyme Demetrius fent his father worde that he was not well. Thereuppon Antigonus went to fee him, and comming thither, he mette a faven younge boye at his doore. So he went uppero his chamber, and fitting downe by his bedde fide the tooke him by the hande to feele his poulfe. Demetrine tolde him that his feuer had left him but a litle before. I knowe it well, fayde Antigoniu: for I mette the younge boye euen at the doore as I came in . So Antigoniu did gently beare with his sonnes faultes, in respecte of his many other vertues he had. true, then meete to be spoken: the enemies could but maruell when they sawe his gallies

him to let him fee his engines of batterie, and his gallies rowing uppon the fea. Demetrius graunting him, Lysimachus returned with wonderfull admiration. The RHODIANS also having long time defended his feege, at the last made peace with him, and prayed him to leave some one of his engines with them, for a perpetuall testimonie & remembrance both of his power, and also of their corage and valliantnes. The cause why Demetrius made warre with the Rho-DIANS, was, bicause they were confederats with king Ptolomy, he brought against their walles the greatest engine he had, the foote whereof was like a tyle, more long then broade, and at the base on either side it was eyght and fortie cubits longe, and three score and fixe highe, ri- F fing still narrow even to the very top: so that the ypper partes were narrower then the nether. & within it were many prety roomes and places conucied for fouldiers. The forepart of it was

A open towards the enemie, & every roome or partition had windowes, but of the which they bestowed all kind of shot, bicause they were full of armed men, fighting with all sortes of weanons. But nowe, bicaufeit was fo well framed and counterpeated, that if gave no way, nor reeld of ether fide, which way foener they removed it, but that it floode fall and upright upon her foundacion, making a terrible novie and founde: that made the workers wonderfull to behold, as it was a maruelous pleasure for men to see it In this warre were brought white Del metrius two notable armors weying fortie pownd a peece, and made by one rolling and wino rer: who to frewe the hardness and goodness of the temper, fuffered then to be promet and subjections thot at at fix fcore paces, with the engines of their batterie; and albeit the atmoss were free by Zoilman ar and hit, yet were they never pearfed, and but onely a little race or skretch feetie, as it were of R abodkin or penkinge, and had no more hurte. Demetrius alwayes ware one of them in thele warres, and Aleiman A LEANTAN the other, the strongest and valliantest wan he had in all wee hoaft, and sharonely caried a complete armour weying fixe foore pownder where affecting Alimus Alfouldiers ware none aboue three score. This Aleimus was flavnear Ringows Walking how building of ting by the Theater . In this feege the RHODIANS did valliantly defende them felices, that Della for foreigned merries could doe no acte worthy memorie. This notwithflanding , although he have the worth could not preuaile, but lose his tyme, yet was he the more obstinately beneargainfe the higher be euen with them: bicause they had taken a shippe of his in the while his wife phila had the difference fent vnto him certaine hangings of tapestrie, linnen, apparell, and letter & hard beaute of the Rho had fent them all vnto Ptolomy, affoone as they had raken them. But the remember dittale solle Nowe though this pair did milet grene and of The great on fend him, yet he could not finde in his hart to ferue them in that forte; when he might have benien you done it not longe after . For by channee at that tyme , Protogenes an excellent paynter; borne to king Philip in the city of CAVNVs, did paynt them the draught of the citic of lat vs vs. Demetriks found borne in the this table in a house in the suburbes of the citie, being almost ended. new denifes to flatter and please him. For they ordevned that the place behind the temple of A Mineras, called Parchenon (as who would fay, the temple of the virgin) (hould be prepared for his house to lye in ; and they sayd, that the goddesse Minerus did lodge him with her . Bur to fay truely, he was too ynchaft a gheft, to thinke that a mayden goddeffe would be content he shouldelye with her. And yet his father Antigonas perceiuing that they had lodged his fonne Philip on a time in a house, where there were three younge women, he sayde nothing to Philip him felfe, but before him he fent for the harbinger, and fayde vato him: wilt thou not remove my fonne out of this straight lodging & provide him of a better? And Demetring that should have reverenced the goddesse Minerai, though for no other respect, but bicause he called her his eldest fifter, (for fo he woulde the thoulde be called) he defiled all the castell where was the temple of their holy virgines, with horrible and abominable infolencies, both B towards younge boyes of honest houses, as also vnto younge women of the citie. So that this place feemed to be most pure and holy, at fuch time as he lave with his common Curtifans, Chryfis Bamis Demo, and Anticyra, It shall not be greatly for the honor of the citie of ATHENS. to tell perticularly all the abhominable partes he committed there, But Democles vertue and honeflie descrueth worthye and condigne remembrance. This Democles was a younge boye that had no heare on his face, of whole beautie Demetrius being informed by the furname he had, as commonly called through the citie, Democles the faver: he fought divers waies to intife him, both by fayor meanes, large promisses and giftes, and also with threates besides. But when he fawno man could bringe him to the bent of his bowe, and that the younge boye in the ende feeing bim to importunate vpon him, came no more to the common places of ex- C craife where other children yied to recreate them selves, and that to avoide the common froques he went to wash him selfe in another secret stoone: Demetrius watching his time and hower of going thicher followed him, and got in to him being alone. The boy feing him felfe alone & that he could not refift Demetrius, tooke of the couer of the ketle or chawdron where the water was boyling, and leaping into it, drowned him felfe. Truely he was vnworthy of fo lamentable an ende, but yet he shewed a noble hart, worthy of his beautie and contry. But he did not as another called Cleanets, the fonne of Cleomedon, who brought letters from Demetrius directed to the people, whereby, through Demetrius interceffion & request, his fathers fine of fifty talents in the which he was condemned (and for nonpayment remained prisoner) was clerely remitted and forgiuen. But by this acte, he not onely thamed and dithonored him felf, D but also troubled all the citie. For the people thereuppon released Cleomedon of his fine, but therewith they made a decree that no Citizen should thenceforth bring any moe letters from Demetrius But afterwards, understanding that Demetrius was maruelously offended with this decree: they did not onely reuoke their first decree, but they did also put some of them to death, which were the procurers and authors of the decree, and others also they banished. And further they made a lawe, that the people of ATHENS should account all religious to the gods, and just vnto men, what sever it pleased Demetrius to order and appoynt. At that time there was one of the chiefest men of the citie, that saide Stratocles was a mad man to preferre fuch matters. In deede, o Demochares furnamed LACONIAN, he were a mad man if he were otherwife : and he spake it bicause this Stratocles had many great pleasures at Demetrius hands E for this flatterie. Howbeit Demochares being accused and condemned upon these wordes, he was banished A THENS. See after what forte the A THENIANS vsed them selves, who seemed to be delivered from the garrison they had before, and to be restored vnto their former libertic and freedom. From thence Demetrius went into Peloponnes vs. and neuer an enemie of his durst tary his comming, but all fled before him, and left him their castels & townes. Thus De-

MANYINEA: & for the fumme of an hundred talents given amongest them, he delivered the cities of Argos, Sicyone, and of Corinthe, from the garrisons that laye amongest them. About that tyme fell out the great feast of Juno in An Gos, called Herza. Therefore Demetring, to honor this feaste with the GRECIANS, married Deidamie (the Daughter F of AEacides, king of the Molossians, and fifter of Pyrrhus) and perswaded the Signania ANS to leave their citie, and to come and builde in an other goodly place neare visto its

metries wan vnto him selfe all the contry called ACTB, and all ARCHADIA, saving the citie of

A where they now doe dwell: and so with the place and situacion, he chaunged also the name 2std the tasks of the citie. For in steadeof Sicyone, he made it to be called DEMETRIADE. Then at a gene- sityene, and rall affembly of the states of GRECE, which was kept in the straight of PELOPONNESVS, cal-called in Dez led Is THMOS: Demetrius was chosen Lieuetenant generall of all the GRECIANS, as Philip & Demetrial Alexander, (both kings of MACEDON) had bene before him, vnto whom he did not only com- chosen gentle pare him felfe, but thought him felfe greater than they, bicause fortune smiled on him, and rall of all for that he had so good successe in all his affayres. Whereas Alexander did neuer take away the tirle and name of king from any other kings: nether did euer call him felfe king of kings, although he had given vnto divers of them the name and power of a king. And in contrary manner also, Demetrius laughed them to scorne which called any other Princes, kings, but his father and him selfe. Moreouer he tooke great pleasure to heare his statterers, who being at Demeritation banketts called for wine to drinke to king Demetrius, and then to Seleucus maister of the Ele- pride.

phants to Ptolomy Admiral to Lylimachus keeper of the treasure, and to Agathocles Siciliana gouernor of the Iles. All the kings, but Lylimachus, laughed at these toyes when they were reported to them: but Lysimachus was very angry, & thought great skorne that Demetrius should reckon him a gelding, for that it was an old cultom commoly to give an Evenuke the charge of keeping the treasure. So Lylinachus of all other Princes did beare him most malice, and bicause he would finely tawnt him for that he euer kept Lamia his Curtisan with him: vntil this present time, said he' I neuer saw harlot play in a tragedy before. Demetrius aunswered him as gaine, that his harlot was chafter, then Penelope his wife. So Demetrius departing for that C time out of Peloponnesus, tooke his jorney towards Athens, and wrote before to the A-THE NIANS. that when he came thither he would be received into the fraternitie of the holy mysteries, and that he ment they should shew him at one selfe time, all that was to be seene.e. uen from the least to the highest secrets of their ceremonies, called Epoptiess, bicause they made the brethren of the fraternitiesee them long time after that they had bene first received into the leffer ceremonies: the which was not lawfull then neither was ever heard of before. For these smaller misteries in olde time were celebrated in the month of Nouember, and the greater in the month of August: & beside it was not lawfull to celebrate or vse these ceremonies within the space of a yeare one of thother. When thele letters were openly red, no man durft speake against them, but Pythodorus the Priest, who caried the torche lighted when they D shewed these misteries. Howbeit his words preuailed not, for by the deuise of Stratocles it was enacted at an affembly of the citie, that the month of March in the which they were at that time. (hould be called and reputed November. And so, as they could best helpe it by their ormisteries, whereby Demetrius was admitted to see the most straightest and secretest ceremonies. Therefore Philippides the Poet inueying against the facriledge, and impietie of religion Philippides prophaned by Stratocles, made these verses of him: Into one mooneth his comming hither Hath thrust up all the yeare togither.

And afterwards bicause Stratocles was the procurer that Demetrius was lodged in the temple of Minerua within the castell:

dinaunces of the citie, they did receive Demetrius into the fraternitie of the misteries: & afterwards againe, this felfe month of March which they had translated into Nouember . became

But yet of all the infolent parts done at that time in ATHENS, (although many were committed)none of all the reft greued the A THENTANS more, then this did: that Demetrius commaunded them they should presently furnish him with two hundred & fifty talents. The taxation of this payment was very harde vnto them, both for the shortnes of the time appoynted them, as also for the impossibilitie of abating any part of it. When he had seene all this masse Demetring of money laid on a heapebefore him, he commaunded it should be given to Lamia, & among of a contained his other Curtifans, to buy them fope. The shame the ATHENIANS received by this gift, gre- to his carriued them more, than the loffe of their money: & the words he spake to the great contempt of fent to bay them and their citie, did more trouble them, then the payment they made. Some fay not with standing, that Demetrius did not alone viethe A THENIANS thus shamefully, but the THESSA. LIANS also in the same manner. But passing this ouer: Lamia of her selfe, & through her owner countenance, did get a great summe of money together of divers persons for one supper she made vnto Demetrius, the preparation whereof was of such exceeding charge, that Lycaus borne in the Ile of Samos, did fet downe the order thereof in writing. And therefore a certain Lamia Elepa- Poet no lesse pleasantly, then truely, called this Lamia, Elepolis: to wete, an engine to take cities. And Demochares also borne in the citie of Soli, called Demetrius a fable, bicause he had Lamia euer with him: as in the fables which olde women tell litle children, there is euer lightly a Lamia, as much to fay, as a witche, or forcereffe. So that the great credit & authoritie this Lamia had and the love which Demetrius bare her: did not onely cause his wives suspect and R enuy him, but made him hated also of all his friends & familliers. And therfore certen gentleme whom Demetrius fent in ambassade vnto king Lysmachus, he talking famillierly with them. & passing the time away, shewed them great wounds of the clawes of a lyon vpon his armes and legges, telling them also how he was forced to fight with thelyon, when through king Alexanders fury he was shut up in his denne with him: they smiling to heare him, told him that the king their maister had also certeine markes and bytings on his necke, of a vile beast called and did fo constantly loue her fo long together, considering that she was also very old, & past the best. Therefore Demo, surnamed Mania, (as much to say, the mad woman) pleasantly aun- C fwered Demetrius, asking her one night when Lamia had plaied on the flute all supper time. what she thought of Lamia? an old woman, O king, o she. Another time when frute was fer-& Demenius ued in, after the bord was taken vp: doe you fee faid Demetrius, how many prety fine knackes Lamia sendeth me? My mother, aunswered Demo againe, will fend you moe then these, if you please to lye with her. It is reported of this Lamia, that she overthrew Bocchoris judgement in a matter. In Æ GYPT there was a young man that had a maruelous fancievnto a famous Cur-A prety fute tisan, called Thonis: who did aske him such a great summe of money to lye with her, that it Pon a loners was unpossible for him to give it her. At length, this amorous youth beeing so deepe in love dreame, and with her, dreamed one night he laye with her, and enjoyed her: fo that for the pleasure he she indeement renerfed by tooke by his conceyt and imagination, when he awaked, his earnest loue was farisfied. This D Lamiathe Curtifan whome he had cast fancieto, hearing of his dreame, did put him in sure before Ciarifan. the Iudges, to be payed her hyer for the pleasure the younge man had taken of her by imagination. Bocchoris hearing the fumme of her complaynt, commaunded the younge man to him to lye with her. Then he badde him toffe it too and froe in his hande before the Curtifan, that she shoulde but onely have the shadowe and fight of it: for, the , imagination and The family opinion, is but a shadowe of truth. Lamia sayde this was no equal sudgement: for, sayth she, the shadowe onely, or the fight of the money, did not fatisfie the couetousnes of the werfing Bac-thoris femilies. Curtifan, as the younge mans luft was quenched by his dreame. Thus enough spoken of Lamia, But now, the misfortunes and leafts of him we presently write of they do transport our E historie, as from a comycall into a tragicall theater, that is to saye, from pleasaunt and light The confpira- matter, into lamentable and bytter teares. For all the Princes and Kinges confpyred geneer of the kings rally agaynst Antigonus, and joyned all their force and armies together. Therefore Demetrius departed forthwith out of GRECE, and came to ioyne with his father, whose courage he founde more liuely and better giuen to this warre, then his yeares required: befides that Demetrius comming made him the bolder, and did life vppe his harte the more. And yet it seemes to me, that if Antigonus woulde but have yeelded vppe a fewe trifling thinges, and that he coulde or woulde have brydeled his ouer immoderate couetous defire to raigne: he had bothe kept for him felse all the tyme of his life, and also lefte after his deathe vnto his fonne, the supreamest dignitie and power, about all the other Kinges and F fucceffors of Alexander. But he was so cruell, and rashe of nature, and as insolent and braue in his doinges, as in his wordes: that thereby he stirred vppe, and brought vppon him as his

A enemies, many great and mighty Princes. For even at that prefent time he faid, that he would as easely disperse and scatter a funder that conspiracie against him, as chowghes or other litle birdes comming to pecke up the corne newly fowen, are eafely scared awaye with a stone, or making any little noyfe. So he caried to the field with him, about three fcore and tenne thow. Anthony the fand footemen, tenne thowfand horfemen, and three score and fifteene Elephantes. His ene- his enem mies had three score and soure thowsande sootemen, and siue hundred horsemen more then he, with foure hundred Elephants, and fix score cartes of warre. When the two armies were one neere vnto the other, me thinkes he had some imaginacion in his head that chaunged his hope, but not his corage. For in all other battells and conflictes, having commonly vied to looke bigge of the matter, to have a lowde high voyce, and to vie brave wordes, and fome-

B time also euen in the chiefest of all the battell to geue some pleasant mocke or other, shewing a certaine trust he had in him selfe, and a contempt of his enemie: then they sawe him oftentimes alone, and verie penfiue, without euer a word to any man. One day he called all his armie together, and presented his sonne vnto the souldiers, recommending him vnto them, as his heire and fuccessor, and talked with him alone in his tent. Whereat men maruelled the more, bicause that he neuer ysed before to imparte to any man the secrets of his counsell and determination, no not to his owne fonne, but did all things of him felfe; and then commaunded that thing openly to be done, which he had fecretly purposed. For proofe hereof it is faid, Demetrius being but a young man, asked him on a time when the campe should remoue: and that Antigonus in anger auniwered him, art thou affrayed thou shalt not heare the found of the trompet? Furthermore, there fell out many ill fignes and tokens that killed their harts. Demenius For Demetrius dreamed that Alexander the great appeared armed vnto him at all peeces, and deeme and that he asked him what word or fignall of battell they were determined to gene at the day of figners the battell. He auniwered that they were determined to gene. Impiter, and Victorie. Then faid Alexander, I will goe to thine enemies that shall receive me. And afterwardes, at the very day of the ouerthrow, when all their armie were fet in battell ray: Antigonus comming out of his tent, had fuch a great fall, that he fell flat on his face on the ground, and hurte him felfe verice forely. So when he was taken vp, then lifting vp his handes to heaven, he made his prayers vnto the goddes, that it would please them to graunt him victorie, or sodaine death without

E enemies: & the rest of them fled enery man. And when a great trowpe of men together went with great furie to geue charge on that fide where Antigonus was : one of them that were about him, fayd vnto him: your grace had neede take heede, for these men come to charge vs.

He aunswered againe: but how should they know me? And if they did, my sonne Demetrius to fundrie peeces: they deuided Antigonus kingdome among them, and euerie man had his part of all the prouinces and contries which Antigonus kept, adding that ynto their other do-great paine, before he should see him selfe vanguished, and his armie ouerthrowen. When D both battells came to joyne, and that they fought hand to hand: Demetrius that had the most remember the parte of the horsemen with him, went and gaue charge vpon Antiochus the sonne of Seleucus, Pon the first and fought it out fo valliantly on his fide, that he ouerthrewe his enemies, and put them to Anthorhus flight. But too fondly following the chase of them that fledde, and out of time: he marred all, the some of and was the occasion of the losse of his victorie. For when he returned from the chase, he occasion with the information of the losse of the state o could not ioyne againe with their footemen, bicause the Elephants were between both. Then chasing the Selencus perceiuing Antigonus battell was naked of horsemen, he did not presently set vpon enemies, he them, but turned at one fide as though he woulde enuiron them behinde, and made them affrayed yet making head as he would charge them, only to geue them leafure to come on their nercone. side, as they did. For the most parte of Antigonus hoast did forsake him, and yeelded vnto his his will: he fodainly departed thence, and fayled towardes GRECE, putting his greatest confidence & affiance in the ATHENIANS, bicause he had left his wife Deidamia at ATHENS, with shippes and some money, supposing he could goe no whether with better safety in his aduerfitie, then to ATHENS, of whose good wills he thought him selfe assured. Wherefore when

Ambassadors of the ATHENIANS came vnto him, and found him not farre from the Iles Cy-him, he should forbeare to come vnto their citie, bicause the people had made an ordinance to fuffer no moekings to come into ATHENS, and that they had fent Deidamia his wife hono-B rablic accompanied vnto the citie of MEGARA: then was Demetrius for verie anger & passion of minde, cleane out of countenaunce, although vntill that time he had paciently borne his aduersitie, and his hart had neuer failed him. But this nipped him to the harte, when he sawe (that contrarie to exspectacion) the ATHENIANS had deceived and failed him in his greatest neede, and that in his aduersitie he found their former frendshippe counterseate, and altogether diffembled. Whereby most plainly appeareth, that the most vncerteine and deceiueable profe of peoples good wills and cities towardes Kings and Princes, are the immefurable and extreame honors they doe vnto them. For fith it is fo, that the trueth and certainty of honor proceedeth from the good will of those that give it: the feare which the common people commonly stand in of the power of kings, is sufficient cause for them to mistrust that the people doe it not with good will and from their harts, confidering that for feare they doe the felse same things, which they will also doe for loue. Therefore graue and wife Princes should not passe so much for the images and statues they set up for them, or the tables or divine honors they doe decree vnto them: as to regard their owne workes & deedes, and weying them truely, fo to believe and receive their honors for true, or otherwife to reject and mistrust them, as things done by compulsion. For commonly it is that which maketh the people to hate kings the more, when they doe accept these immesurable and extreame honors done vnto them, but those forces chiefly hate them most, that against their wills are forced to doe them those honors. Demetrius feeing then how iniuriously the Athenians had vsed him, & at that time not knowing how to be reuenged of them: he modeftly fent vnto them only to make his com- D plaints, and to demaund his thippes, among the which was that galley of fixteene banckes of owers. The which when he had received, he hoysed faile immediatly towards the straight of PELOPONNESVS, and there found all things to goe against him. For in euery place where he had left any garrison, the Captaines that had the charge of them, either yeelded them vp, or else revolted, & kept them against him. Therfore leaving Pyrrhus his Lieutenaunt in GR ECE, he tooke sea againe, & sailed towards CHERRONESVS, & there with the mischieues he did,& with the spoiles he got in king Lysimachus land, he payed his men, and enriched his army, the which began againe to increase, & to be dreadfull to his enemies. But now for Lysimachus, the other kings made no great accompt of him, neither did they sturre to geue him aide, bicause he was nothing inferior vnto Demetrius; and for that he was of greater power and possessions E then them selves, they therefore were the more affrayed of him. Shortly after, Seleucus sent vnto Demetrius, to require his daughter Stratonice in mariage, notwithstanding that he had a quireth Sira- fonne alreadie called Antiochus, by his wife Apama 2 PERSIAN. Howbeit he thought that his affaires and greatnes of his effate and kingdom, was able enough to maintaine many fucceffors after him. And furthermore, he confidered with him felfe that he should have neede of sonice (Dedaughter) in Demetrius allyance, bicause he saw Lysimachus him selse matche with one of Ptolomyes daughters, & his sonne Agathocles with his other daughter. Demetrius seeing this good fortune offered him beyond all hope, presently tooke his daughter with him, & failed with all his shippes Pliftmehm. directly towards Syria. In the which voyage he was constrained of necessitie to lande sometimes, and specially in CILICIA, the which Plistarchus the brother of Cassander kept at that F that time Go- time, being genen him by the other kings for his parte and porcion of the spoyle of Antigonus, after he was ouerthrowen. This Pliftarchus thinking that Demetrius landed not to refresh

A himselfe, but to forrage and spoyle bicause he would complaine of Seleutue for the allyance hemade with their common enemie, without the confent and privitie of all the other Kings and Princes confederats, he went purposely voto his brother Castander. Demetrius having intelligence thereof, fodainly innaded the land, and spoyled as farre as the citie of C YND Es, and Dementum caried away (which he had leavied) twolug hundred ralentes, which he found yet left of his fa- mundeth the there treasure: and then with all the speede he could possible he returned to his shippes, and housed fayle. Shortly after, his wife tibila also came vnto him. So Seleucus received them all necrounto the citie of Onosavs, and there their meeting was Princely, without forow or fufuicion one of the other. First of all Seleucus did feast Demetrius in his tene, in the middest of

warmed, and having no fouldiers to waite upon them : vntill at length Selencus with his wife marieth sma Strutonice departed, and tooke his way with great pompetowardes the citie of Antiochia min dange-Nowe for Demetrin, he kept the province of CILICIA, and fent his wife Phila vnto her bro- un ther Cassander, to aunswere the complaints and accusacions of Plistarchus against him. In the meane time Deidamia his wife departed out of GRECE to come vnto him: who after the had remained with him a few dayes, dyed of a lickeneffe. Afterwardes Demetrius comming againe The death of infauor with Paolomy, by Seleucus his fonne in lawes meanes the maried his daughter Ptolemai - Deidania de. Hitherunto Seleucus vied Demetrius verie curteoully: but afterwards he prayed him to deliver him Ciricragaine, for a fumme of money that he offered him: but Demetrius plainly, Demerius denyed him. Then did Seleuem shew a cruell and tyrannicall couetousnesse: for in anger, and lemeide, Prowith florce threats and countenaunce he askedhim the cities of Tyr, and Sidon. But there- lomies daughin me thinkes he lacked honestie and civility: as though he that had under his obedience and we Subjection all that which lay betweet the Indians, and the sea of Synia, was in suche neede Differnion betweet De and pouerise "that for two cities onely, he shoulde drive his father in law from him, who had menius and fusteined so hard & bitter change. But thereby he rightly confirmed Platoes saying: that he Selences. that will be riche in deede, must endeuor him felfe not to increase his riches, but rather to diminish his couctousnes. For he shall neuer be but a begger, and needle, whose couctous defire hath no ende. This notwithstanding, Demetrius yeelded not for feare, but provided to replenish the cities with good garrifons to keepe them against him: faying, that though he had bene ouercome ten thow fande times more in battell, yet it should never fincke into his head that he shoulde be contented, and thinke him selfe happie to buy Seleusus allyance so deere. On thother fide, being advertised that one Lachares having spied oportunitie when the A-THENTANS were in civill warres one against the other, and that he had overcomen them, and did tyrannically vsurpe the gouernment: he then perswaded him selfe that he might easely winne it againe, if he came thither upon the fodaine. Thereuppon he croffed the feas with a Demention great fleete of fhippes, without any daunger: but he had fuch a great florine & tempeft ypon iorney against the coast of ATTICA, that he lost the most parte of his shippes, and a great number of his men besides. But for him selfe he scaped, and began to make a little warre with the ATHENI-ANS. Yet perceiuing that he did no good there, but lost his time : he fent some of his men to E gather a number of Thippes againe together, and he him felfe in the meane time went into Peloponnes vs, to laye fiege to the citie of Messena, where his person was in greate daunger. For fighting hard by the wall, he had fuch a blowe with a dare, that it his him full in the mouth, and ranne through his cheeke. No twithstanding this, after he was healed of that wound, he brought into his subjection againe, certaine townes that had rebelled against him. After that, he returned againe into ATTIC A, and tooke the cities of ELHVSIN, and of RHAMwvs: and then spoyled all the contrie, & tooke a shippe fraight with corne, and hong up the marchaunt that ought it, and the maister of the shippe that brought it. Thereby to terrifie all other marchauntes, that they should be affrayed to bring any more come thither, and so to familh the citie, by keeping them from all thinges necessarie for their sustenaunce: and so it happened. For a bushell of falt was fold at ATHENS for fortiefiluer Drachmas, and the bushell of wheate for three hundred Drachmas. In this extreame necessitie, the ATHENIANS had but a short ioy for the hundred and fiftie gallies they saw neere vnto Æ GINA, the which their anckers, and fled prefently. Then Lachares for fooke the city, and feeretly faued him felfe: Nowe the ATHENIANS, who before had commaunded uppon paine of death; that no man should make any motion to the counsell, to treate of any peace with Demetrius: they did then vpon Lachares flying, prefently open the gates next vnto Demetrius campel and fent Ambaffai dours vnto him, not looking for any grace or peace, but bicaufe necessisse draue themeois. During this fo hard and straight siege, there fell out many wonderfull and straunge things but among others, this one is of special note. It is reported that the father and the sonne stranging their house, voide of all hope of life : there fell a dead ratte before them from the toppe of the B A rare desife house, and that the father and some sought who should have it to eate. Moreover, that at the felfe same siege the Philosopher Epicurus maintained him selse and his schollers, by gening them a proporcion of beanes euerie day, by the which they lived. Thus the citie of A THENS being brought vnto this extremitie. Demetrine made his entrie into it, and gaue commands dement to all the citizens, that they should affemble euerie man within the Theater: where he made them to be compassed in with armed fouldiers, and then placed all his gard armed about the stage. Afterwards he came downe him selfe into the Theater, through high gallet ries and entries by the which the common players vsed to come to play their partes in tragedies, infomuche as the ATHENIANS were then worse affrayed then before: howbeit Demetrius presently pacified their feare, as soone as he beganne to speake vnto them. For he did C not facion his Oration with a hastie angrie voyce, neither did hevse any sharpe or bitter wordes: but onely after he had curreoully told them their faults and discurtesie towards him: he fayd he forgaue them, and that he would be their frende againe: and furthermore, he canfed tenne millions of buthells of wheate to be geuen vnto them, and stablished such Gouernors there, as the people milliked not of. Then Democles the Orator, feeing that the people gaue out great showtes of ioy in the praise of Demetrius, and that the Orators dayly contended in the pulpit for Orations, who should exceede other in preferring newe honors for Des metrius: he caused an order to be made, that the hauens of PIREVS and MVNYCHIA should be put into Demetrius handes, to vie at his pleasure. This being stablished by voyces of the people. Demetrius of his owne private authoritie did place a greate garrifon within the force D called Mys EVM, bicause the people should rebell no more against him, nor divert him from his other enterprises. Thus when he had taken ATHENS, he went to set you the LACEDE MONIANS. But Archidamus king of LACED EMON, came against him with a pullant armie, whom he discomfited in battell, and put to flight, by the citie of MANTINEA. After that he inuaded LACONIA with all his armie, and made an inrode to the citie of SPARTA, wherehe once againe ouerthrew the LACED EMONIANS in fet battell, tooke five hundred of them prifoners, and flue two hundred: infomuch that every man thought he might even then goe to SPARTA without any daunger to take it, the which had never yet bene taken affore by any. variable for But there was never king that had so often and sodaine chaunges of fortune as Demetrius, nor that in other affaires was euer so often litle, and then great: so sodainly downe, and vp againe: B fo weake, & straight so strong. And therefore it is reported, that in his great aduersities when fortune turned so contrarie against him, he was wont to crie out vppon fortune, that which AEschylus speaketh in a place: Thou feemst to have begotten me, of purpose for to showe

Thy force in lifting of me up, me downe againe to throw.

Nowe againe when his affaires prospered so well, and that he was likely to recouer a great force and kingdome: newes were brought him, first that Lysimachus had taken all his townes from him, which he helde in Asia: and on the other fide, that Ptolomy had won from him all the realme of CYPRVs, the citie of SALAMINA onely excepted, in the which he kept his mother and children very straightly besieged. This notwithstanding, fortune played with him, as the wicked woman Archelochus fpeaketh of, who,

And in the other fire bestown.

For taking him away, and (as it were) the citie of Sparra also out of his handes by these dreadfull newes, euen when he was certaine to have won it: the presently offered him hopes of other great and new thinges, by this occasion following. After the death of Cassander, Philinwho was the eldest of all his other sonnes, and left his heire and successor in the kingdome of MACEDON: he reigned no long time ouer the MACEDONIANS, but deceased soone after his father was dead. The two other brethren also fell at great variance, and warres together. Great differso that the one called Antipater, flue his owne mother Thessaloniea: and the other being A- tion and firise Transfer, called in to aide him Demetrius, and Pyrrhus, the one out of the realme of Epinvs, of Macedon, and the other out of PELOPONNES VS. Pyrrhus came first before Demetrius, and kept a great after the parte of Maced on for recompence of his paines, comming to aide him at his defire: fo that fander. he became a dreadful neighbour vnto Alexander him felfe, that had fent for him into his connie. Furthermore, when he was aduertised that Demetrius did presently vpon the receite of Alexander, his letters, fet forward with all his armie to come to aide him: the young Prince Alexander, Cassander, was twife as muche more amazed and affrayed, for the great estate and estimacion of Demetrius. So he went to him notwithstanding, and received him at a place called Deion, and there Demerius imbraced and welcomed him. But immediatly after, he told him that his affaires were nowe Magdon. in fo good state, that praised be the goddes he should not now neede his presence to aide him. After these words the one began to mistrust the other, So it chaunced one day, that as Deme- VVyles betrius went to Alexanders lodging where the feast was prepared: there came one to him to tell treat Alehim of an ambush that was layed for him, and how they had determined to kill him when he Demering should thinke to be meric at the banket. But Demetrius was nothing abashed at the newes, and only went a litle foftlier, not making fuch haft as he did before, and in the meane time fent to commaunde his Captaines to arme their men, and to have them in readines: and willed his gentlemen and all the rest of his officers that were about him, (which were a greater number by many than those of Alexanders side) enery man of them to go in with him into the hall, and to tarie there till he rose from the table. By this meanes the men whome Alexander had appointed to affault him, they durst not, being affrayed of the great traine he had brought with him. Furthermore, Demetrius faining that he was not well at ease at that time to make merie, he went immediatly out of the hall, and the next morning determined to depart, making him beleue that he had certaine newes brought him of great importaunce: and prayed Alexander to pardon him, that he could no lenger keepe him companie, for that he was driven of necesfitie to depart from him, and that an other time they woulde meete together, with better leafure and libertie. Alexander was verie glad to fee that Demetrius went his way out of M ACE-DON not offended, but of his owne good will: whereuppon he brought him into THESSALY, and when they were come to the citie of LARISSA, they began againe to feast one an other, to intrappe eche other: the which offered Demetrius occasion to haue Alexander in his hand, as he would with him felfe. For Alexander of purpose would not have his gard about him fearing least thereby he should teach Demetrius also to stand upon his gard. Thus Alexander turned his practife for an other, vpon him selfe: for he was determined not to suffer Demetrius to cape his handes, if he once againe came within daunger. So Alexander being bidden to fupper to Demetrius, he came accordingly. Demetrius rifing from the borde in the middest of supper, Alexander rose also, being affrayed of that straunge manner, and followed him foote by foote to the verie dore. Then Demetrius layd but to his warders at the gate, kill him that followeth me. With those wordes he went out of the dores, and Alexander that followed him was flaine in the place, and certaine of his gentlemen with him which came to rescue him: of Demenius the which, one of them as they killed him fayd, that Demetrius had preuented them but one killeth Aleday. All that night, (as it is no other likely) was full of vprore and tumult. Howbeit, the next forme of Cafmorning the MACEDONIANS being maruelously troubled & affrayed of Demetrius great po- funder. wer, when they faw that no man came to affaile them, but that Demetrius in contrarie maner fent vnto them to tell them that he would speake with them, and deliuer them reason for that he had done: then they all began to be bolde againe, and willingly gaue him audience. Nowe Demetrius needed not to vse many wordes, nor to make any long Orations, to win them vnto

DON, and thereuppon brought him backe into MACED ON, to take possession of the kingdom.

This chaunge was not milliked of the other MACEDONIANS that remained at home in their contrie, for that they yet remembred the traiterous and wicked fact of Cassander, against Ale.

Demetrius having this great good happe and fortune comen vnto him, he received newes also that Ftolomy had not onely raised his siege from the cities & SALAMINA, where he kept his mother and children straightly besieged: but further, thathe had done them great honor, and bellowed great giftes vpon them. On the other fide also he was aduertifed, that his daughter Stratonice, who had before bene maried vnto Seleucus, was now maried againe vnto Antiochus, the sonne of the sayd Seleucus, and how that she was crow-

Erafffiratus the Phificians care, to finde Prince An-Biochus lone. Satisho defaribeth the fignes and so-

ned Queene of all the barbarous nations inhabiting in the high provinces of Asia: and that Seleucus ma came to passe in this maner. It chaunced that this young Prince Antiochus (as loue ouercommeth all men) became in loue with his mother in law Stratonice, who alreadie had a fonnely Seleucus his father. She being young, & passing fayer, he was so rauished with her, that though he proued all the waves possible to maister his furie and passion that way : yet he was still the weaker. So that in the end, condemning him felfe to death bicause he found his desire abho-C minable, his passion incurable, & his reason veterly ouercome: he resolved to kill him selfe by litle and litle, with abstinence from meate and drinke, and made no other reckoning to remedie his griefe, faining to haue fome fecret inward disease in his body. Yet could he not so finely cloke it, but that Erafistratus the Phisitian easely found his griefe, that love, not sicknes, was his infirmitie: howbeit it was hard for him to imagine with whom he was in loue. Erafiltratus being earnestly bent to finde out the partie he loued, he sate by this young Prince all day long in his chamber, and when any faver young boy or wife came to fee him, he earnestly looked Antiochus in the face, & carefully observed all the partes of the bodie, and outward mounts. which do commonly bewray the fecret passions & affections of the mind. So having marked him divers times, that when others came to fee him, what focuer they were, he still remeined D in one selfe state, and that when Stratonice his mother in lawe came alone or in companie of her husband Seleucus to visite him, he commonly perceived those signes in him, which Sappho wryteth to be in louers (to wit, that his words and speech did faile him, his colour became red, his eyes still rowled to and fro, and then a sodaine swet would take him, his pulse would beate fast and rise high, and in the end, that after the force and power of his hart had failed him, and shewed all these signes, he became like a man in an extasse & traunse, & white as a kearcher) he then gathering a true coniecture by these so manifest signes and declaracions, that it was only Stratonice whom this young Prince fanfied, and the which he forced him felfe to keepe fecret to the death: thought that to bewray it to the king it would offend him muche, but yet trusting to his great affection and fatherly loue he bare to his sonne, he ventred one day to tell E him, that his fonnes fickneffe was no other but loue, and withall, that his loue was impossible to be enjoyed, and therefore that he must of necessitie dye, for it was incurable, Seleucus was cold at the harte to heare these newes: so he asked him, what, is he incurable? Yea, Sir, aunfwered the Phisitian, bicause he is in loue with my wife. Then replied Seleucus againe, alas Erasistratus, I have alwayes loved thee as one of my dearest frendes, and wouldest thou not now doe me this pleasure, to lette my sonne marry thy wife, sith thou knowest it well that I have no moe sonnes but he, and that I see he is but cast away, if thou helpe me not? But your grace would not doe it your selfe, fayd Erasistratus: if he were in loue with Stratonice. O, fayd Selencus to him againe, that it were the wil of the gods, some god or man could turne his loue that way: for mine owne parte, I would not only leaue him the thing he loued, but I would gene ! my kingdom also to saue his life. The Erasistratus seeing that the king spake these words from his hart, and with abundance of teares he tooke him by the right hand, and told him plainly,

A vour grace needeth not Eralistratus helpe in this. For being father, husbande, and king, your selfe also may onely be the Phisitian, to cure your sonnes disease. When Seleucus heard that.

he called an affemblie of the people, and declared before them all that he was determined to selencus lone crown his fonne Antiochus king of the high prouinces of Asia, & Stratonice Queene, to mar- vnto his fonne ry them together: and that he was perswaded that his sonne, (who had alwayes shewed him felfe obedient to his fathers will) would not disobey him in this mariage. And as for Stratonice, if the milliked this mariage, and would not confent vnto it bicaufe it was no common matter: then he prayed that his frendes would perfwade her she should thinke all good & comely that should please the king, and with all that concerned the general benefit of the realme and common wealth. Hereuppon Antiochus and Stratonice were married together, But now to returne B againe to the history of Demetrius. Demetrius came by the kingdom of MACEDON and THES-SALIB, by this meanes as you have heard, and did moreover possesse the best parte of PELO-PONNESVS, and on this fide the straight, the cities of MEGARA, and ATHENS. Furthermore he led his armie against the Bosotians, who were at the first willing to make peace with him. But after that Cleonymus king of Sparta was come into the city of Thebes with his army, the BOROTIANS encouraged by the faire wordes and allurement of one Pifis, borne in the citie of THESPIS, who at that time bare all the fway & chiefe authoritie among ft them: they gaue vp their treaty of peace they had begon with Demetrius & determined to make warre. Therupon Demetrius wet to beliege the citie of Thebes, & layed his engines of battery vnto it infomuch as Cleonymus for feare, Itale fecretly out of the citie. Thereuppon the THEBANS being also af- The citie of C frayed, yeelded them felues vnto Demetrius mercie: who putting great garrifons into the cities, & having leavied a great fumme of money of the province, left them Hieronymus the historiographer, his Lieutenant & Gouernor there. So it appeared that he vsed them very cur- Hieronymus teoufly, & did them many pleasures, and specially vnto Piss. For when he had taken him prifoner, he did him no hurt, but received him very curteoufly, and yfed him well: and further- merius Lieumore, he made him Polemarchus, (to wit, campe maister) in the city of THESPIS, Shortly af- tenanns. ter these things were thus brought to passe, king Lysimachus by chaunce was taken by an other fred him, went with a great army to inuade the contry of THRACIA, supposing he should find no man to withstande him, but that he might conquer it at his pleasure. Howbeir, so soone as D Demetrius backe was turned, the BOE OTIANS revolted againe from him, & therwithall newes was brought him, that Lysimachus was deliuered out of prison. Then he returned backe with all speede, maruelously offended with the BOEOTIANS, whom he found already discomsitted in battell, by his fonne Antigonus, & went againe to lay fiege to the citie of THEBES, being the chiefe city of al that province of Bonoria. But at that present time, Pyrrhus came & forraged all THESSALY, and entred even to the straight of THERMOPYLES. Therefore Demetrius was constrained to leave his sonne to continewe the siege at THEBES, whilest he him selsewent against Pyrrhus, who sodainly returned againe into his realme. So Demetrius lest ten thowsand footemen, and a thowfand horsemen in THESSALY to defend the contry, & returned with the rest of his army to win THEBES. Thereupon he brought his great engine of batterie called E-E lepolis, against the wall, as you have heard before, the which was thrust forward by litle & litle, with great labor, by reason of the weight and heavines of itrso that it could scant be driven forward two furlongs in two months. But the BOEGT IANS & the THEBANS did valliantly de-

But notwithtranding, occasie mentionia not thinke he based to the fall ment to put others in daunger, and durst not venter him selfe; he fought with them, till at faultin, as It length he was shot through the necke with a sharpe arrow head, that was shot at him from the thin was a wall. Wherewithall he fell very ficke, but yet raifed not his fiege, nor remoued his campe, but tooke the citie of THEBES againe by affault: the which being not long before againe replenifend them felues: and Demetrius of a malicious minde & desire of reuenge, (more oftner then needefull, or to any purpose) compelled his men to go to the assault, & to hazard them selues; so that there were daily a great number of them flaine. Antigonus his sonne perceiuing it:alas, faid he, why doe we thus fuffer our men to be flaine and cast away to no purpose? Wherefore 962 thed with people, was in ten yeares space twife won and taken. Now he put the Thesansin A a maruelous feare, by his cruell threats he gaue them at his coming into THEBE sife that these looked to have received the extreamest punishment the vanquished could have, through the iust wrath and anger of the conqueror. Howbeit after Demetrius had put thirtene of them to death, and banished somethe pardoned all the rest. About that time fell out the celebration of the feast called Pythia, in the bonour of Apollo: and bicause the ETO LIANS kept all the high wayes to bring them vnto the city of DELPHES in the which of olde time they did vie to celebrate those sports aforesaid he caused them to be kept & solemnised at ATHENS as in a place where this god in reason should be best honored & reuerenced, bicause he was patrone of the citie, and for that the ATHENIAN'S maintained that he was their progenitor. From thence he returned into MACEDON& knowing that it was against his naure to liue idelly, & in peace & B feing on the other fide also that the MACED ONTANS did him more service, & were more obedient to him in warres. & that in time of peacethey grew feditious, full of vanity & quarrell he went to make warre with the ÆTOLIANS, and after he had spoiled and destroyed their contry. he left Pantauchus his Lieutenant there, with a great part of his army. Demetrius him felie went in the meane time with the rest of his army against Pyrrbus: and Pyrrbus also against him, but they missed of meeting ech with other. Whereupon Demetrius passed further vnto the realme of EPIRVs, the which he spoiled & forraged. Pyrrhus on the other side went on so farrethat he met with Pantauchus, Demetrius Lieutenant, with whom he fought a battell, and came to the a great hat with his diadeame vpon his head, & was apparelled in purple gownes imbrodered with gold: but also that he did vie to weare certaine wollen shooes on his feete died in purple colour, not wouen, but facioned together like a felt, and gilt vpon it. And furthermore, he had sorney against fword with him: so that he did both hurt him, and was also hurt by him. But in the end Pyrrhus had the upper hand, he put Pantauchus to flight, & flue a great number of his men, & tooke flue @ thow fand prisoners: the which was the chief ouerthrow of Demetrius. For Pyrrhus wan not the MACEDO NIAN sill will fo much for the mischieues & hurts he had done vnto them, as he got him felfe great fame & renowne with them, bicause him selse alone had with his owne hands done all the noble exployes of warre in that iorney: for the which, he was afterwardes had in great estimacion among the MACED ONIANS. Nowe many of them began to fay, that he was the only king of all others, in whom the liuely image of the hardines & valliantnes of Alexander the great was to be seene: & that all the rest, (but specially Demetrius) did but countersease his grauerie & Princely countenaunce, like players vpon a stage that would counterfeate his countenaunce & gesture. And to say truly there was much finenes and curiosity about Demetrius, to make him a playing stocke in comon playes. For some say, that he did not only weare & infolencie.

Demetrius cloke drawen with the filong before caused a cloke to be made of a maruelous rich & sumptuous peece of worke. For vpon it was drawen the figure of the world, with starres and circles of heaven, the which was not throughly finished by the chaunge of his fortune. So, there was neuer king of MACEDON gure of the flares.

after him that durft weare it: albeit there were many prowde & arrogant kings that succeded him. Now the MACED ONIANS were not onely fory, and offended to fee fuche things, as they were not wont to be acquainted withall: but they much more milliked this curious maner of life, & specially bicause he was ill to come to, and worse to be spoken with. For he gaue no au- E dience, or if he did, he was very rough, & would sharply take them vp that had to do with him. As he kept the Ambassadors of the ATHENIANS two yeres, & would geue them no answere & vet made as though he loued them better, then any other people of G R E CE. Another time also he was offended, bicause the Laced Emonians had sent but one man only Ambassador vnto him, taking it that they had done it in despite of him. And so did the Ambassador of the LACED EMONIANS answere him very gallantly, after the LAC ONIAN maner. For when Demer der of Spare, trime asked him, how chauceth it that the LACEDE MONIANS do fend but one man vnto me? No more but one, faid he, O king, vnto one. On a time he came abroad more plainly & popularlike, then he was wont to do: whereby he put the people in good hope that they might the easelier speake with him, and that he would more curteously heare their complaints, Thereupon many came, and put vp their humble supplicacions and bills of peticion vnto him. Hereceiued them, & put them vp in the lappe of his cloke. The poore luters were glad of that, and

A waited upon him at his heeles, hoping they should quickely be dispatched; but when he was woon the bridge of the river of Axius, he opened his cloke, & east them all into the river. This Axius fi went to the harts of the Macedonians, who then thought they were no more governed by aking but oppressed by a tyran: & it grieued the so much more, bicause they did yet remember (either for that they had seene them selves, or otherwise heard their foresathers say) howeenricous king Philip was in all fuch matters, and howe that one day as he paffed through the the praise of fireete; a poore old woman pluckt him by the gowne, and eftioones humbly befought him to king Philips heare her, but he aunswered her he was not then at leasure. Whereuppon the poore woman the holde plainly cried out to him, leave then to be king. This word so nettled him, and he tooke such a freeche of a esceit of it, that he returned presently to his pallace, & setting all other matters a part, did no - poore woman B thing elfe many dayes but gaue him felfe to heare all futes, & began with this poore olde woman. For truly nothing becommeth a Prince better, the to minister instice for Mars (as Timo The chiefest theus faith) fignifieth force, & is a tyran: but inflice & law, according to Pindarus, is Queene of office of a all the world. Moreouer, the wife Poet Homer faith not that Princes & Kings have received the custody of engines, & of munition, neither also strong & mighty ships of Impiter, to kepe them to destroy townes withall:but with them to maintaine law & justice. And therefore he calleth not the cruell & bloody king but the iust & merciful Prince, Jupiters frend & scholler. And Demetrius boasted that he had a name and title contrarie vnto Iupiter, whom they called Policus. or Poliouchos, fignifying protector and preserver of cities: and that he was called Poliorcetet.a

Fortgainer. Thus the ill was taken for the good, & vice preferred for vertue: bicause he could Dementa C not discerne the truth from falsehod, which surned his injustice to glory, & injustry to honor; salled a Fort-But now to returne where we left: Demetrius fell into a great & daungerous fickenes in the ci-gainer. tie of PELLA, during which time he almost lost all MACEDON, by a sodaine invasion Pyrrhus made, who in maner rode it all ouer, & came as farre as the city of EDESSA. Howbeit fo fone as he recouered health again, he eafely draue him out, & afterwards made peace with him, bicause he would not fighting with him (whom he should have daily at his dores stil skirmishing fomtime here, somtime there) lose the oportunity, and weaken him selse to bring that to passe which he had determined. For he had no small matters in his head, but thought to recouer all the realmes his father had: & besides, the preparacion he made was no lesse sufficienthen the purpose of such an imagination required. For he had leanied & affembled an army of a hudred Demenia D thowfand footemen, lacking but two thowfand : and vnto them he had also well neere twelve armie o prethowsand horsemen, & had besides gotten aboue fine hundred shippes together, which were the reconst-built part in the hauen of PIREVS, part at COBINTH, part in the city of CHALCIS, and part a- ring of his bout PELLA. He him selfe in person went through their workehouses, & shewed the artificers realine ahow they should make them, & did help to deuise them: so that every man wondred not onely at his infinite preparacion, but at the greatnes & fumptuousnes of his works. For at that time there was no man living that ever faw a gally of fifteene or fixteene banks of owers. But this is true, that afterwardes Ptolomy, furnamed Philopator, built a gally of forty bankes of owers, the Ptolomers which was two hundred foure score cubits long, & from the keele in height to the top of the worderfull poope, eight & forty cubits: & to looke to the tackle & guide her, required four e hundred ma-E riners, & foure thow and water me to row her, & besides all that she could yet cary about the hatches, wel nere three thowfand fighting men. Howbeit this gally neuer ferued to other purpose but for show, & was like to a house that neuer sturred; & it was neuer removed out of the place where it was built but with maruelous a do,& great dauger, more to make men wonder at it, then for any feruice or commodity it could be imployed vnto. But now, the beauty of Demetrius shippes did nothing hinder their swiftnes & goodnes for fight, neither did the hugenes of their building take away the vse of them, but their swiftnesse and nimblenes descrued more commendacion, then their fumptuousnes & statelines. Thus as this great power & preparacion was in hand, being fuch as neuer king before (fince the time of Alexander the great) had Three kings affembled a greater to invade A sin: thefe three kings, Ptolomy, Seleucus, and Lyfmachus, did all Seleucus Fioyne together against him. And afterwardes also, they sent Ambassadors vnto Pyrrhus in the Ptolomy and name of them all, to draw him to their fide, alluring him to come into MACEDON, perswading confined ahim not to repose any trust in the peace Demetrius had made with him, to make accompt of it gainst Deme-

DEMETRIVS. as a good & fureplace: for, they faid that Demetrius did not give him pledge that he would no. A uer make warre with him, but rather first tooke oportunity him self to make warre with whom he thought good. Prrhu confidering fo much, & finding their words true: there rofe a fharpe & cruell warre on enery fide against Demetrius, who tracted time, & stayed yet to begin. For at one selfe time, Ptolomy with a great fleete of shippes came downe into GRECE, and made all GRECE revolt from him: & Lysimachus also on THRACIAES side, & Pyrrhus vpon the borders of Epirvs, confining with the realme of Maced on, they entred with a great army, & spoiled and facked all as they went. Thereupon Demetrius leaving his sonne Antigonus in GR ACE, he returned with all possible speede into MACED ON, to goe first against Lysimachus. But as he was preparing to go against him, newes were brought him that Pyrrhus had already taken the citie of BERRHOEA. This newes being blowen abroad amongest the MACED ONIANS, all Demetrine R doings were turned topsie turney. For all his campe was straight full of teares & complaints, & his men began openly to shew their anger against him, speaking all the ill they could of him: fo that they would tary no lenger, but enery one prayed leave to depart, preteding to looke to their busines at home, but in truth to go & yeeld them selues vnto Lysmachus. Wherefore Demetrius thought it best for him to get him as farre from Lysmachus as he could and to bend all his army against Pyrrhus: bicause the other was their contry man, & familiarly knowen among the most of them, for that they had served together under Alexander the great, and that as he thought, the MACED ONIANS would not preferre Pyrrhus a strauger, before him. But there his iudgement failed him. For as soone as Pyrrhus had pitched his campe hard by him, the Maca-DO NIANS that had ever loved valliantnes, & had of ancient time efteemed him worthier to be C king, that was the best fouldier & valliantest in the field, and furthermore had heard the report of his great elemency & curtefy he had shewed to the prisoners he had taken: they having had good will of long time fought but good occasion to for sake Demetrius, & to yeeld them selues vnto Pyrrhus, or to any other prince whatfoeuer he were. Then they fecretly began to steale aarmie forway one after an other, by smal companies at the first but afterwards there rose such a general tumult against him throughout all the campe, that some of the were so desperat to go into his and goeth to tent to bid him flie, & faue himfelfe, bicause the MACEDONIANS were too weary with fighting for his curiofity. And yet Demetrius foud these words more gentle, & modest, in respect of the vile & cruel words which others gaue him. So he went into his tent, & cast a black cloke about his face, in stead of his rich & stately cloke he was wont to weare: not like vnto a king, but like a D comon player when the play is done, & then fecretly stale away. When this was knowe in the campe, many of his fouldiers ran to his tent to rifle it, and every man tooke fuch hold of it to haue his part, that they tare it in peces, & drew their fwords to fight for it. But Pyrrhus coming in the middest of the tumult, pacified this sturre, & presently without blow given, wan al Demetrius campe: & afterwards he deuided the realme of MACEDON with Lysmachus, in the which ouerthrowen, & turned out of all his realme: he fled vnto the city of Cassand RIA. There he found his wife Phila, who tooke it maruelous heavily, and could not abide to fee him againes private man, driven out of his kingdom, & the most miserable king that ever was of all other, Wherefore intending no more to follow vaine hope, & detesting the fortune of her husband: E Phila, Deme- she being more constant in calamity then in prosperity, killed her selfe with poison she tooke, Demetrius went from thence into GRECE, purposing to gather together the rest of his shipwracks: and there affembled all his Captaines and frends that he had. So it seemeth to me, the coparison Menelaus maketh of his fortune, in one of the tragedies of Sophocles, in these verses:

Demerriu fir aunge for My state doth turne continually about on fortunes wheele, VV hose double dealing divers times inforst I am to feele: Resembling right the moone whose face abideth at no stay Two nights together, but doth chaunge in shape from day to day: At first she riseth small with hornes. Kntill she have forgone the light and figure of her face. This comparison might I say much better be applied vato Demetrius fortune, to his riffing and falling, and to his ouerthrowe and reliefe againe. For when every man thought his force and power veterly ouerthrowen, then began he to rife agains by repaire of fouldiers, which by litle and litle came vnto him, and straight remined him with good hope. This was the fiest time that he was ever feene meanely apparelled, like a private man vp and downe the control without some shewe'or tokens of a king. Nowe when he beganne to have some hope againe, and was (as it were) entred into the great high way of kinges, and had gotten fouldiers about him, which made a bodie and them of royall power! herestored the THEBANS their libertie and gonernment againg. But the An THEN LANS Once more revolted from him, and did revoke the dignitie and Priefthooders Diphilus, who had bene that years created Priest of the fautours, in steade of the Government, which they called in old time Eponymos, as we have told you before: and made a lawe, that from thencefoorth the auncient and common Gouernors of their citie should be restored an gaine to their auncient manner: and they fent also into MACHDON vnto king Parrbus rather

Howebeit Demetrius came against them with great furing and did straightly besiege the citie of ATHENS. Then the ATHENIANS sent Crases the Philog crases the fopher to him, a man of great estimacion and authoritie, who so handled him, partely by in a schureth de distinct has a schureth de distinct has a schureth de treatie, and partely also through his wife perswasions and counsells he gaue him for his pron then from fit: that Demetrius presently raised his siege. There Eurydice, fifter to his wife Phila, received him by the citie of MILETVM, having with her gon of Ptolomyes daughters & hers, called Ptolemeide, the which had bene affore affianced to him money besides . But Demetrius receiving advertisement that Agathocles, Lyfmachus sonne

But in the end, the plague began also in the middest of this famine, (a common thing, and A almost a matter of necessitie, it should so be) bicause that men being driven to neede and necefficie. doe frame them felues to eate all that comes to hande: whereupon he was driven to bring backe those few men that remained, having lost of all fortes (good and bad) not so fewe as eight thowsand fully told. When he came into the prouince of TAR sys, he commaunded his men in no case to meddle with any thing, bicause the contrie was subject vnto king Selenem; whom he would in no wife displease. But when he sawe it was impossible to stay his men being now brought to fuch extremitie and neede, & that Agathoeles had bard up the straights and passages of mount Taurus against him: he wrote a letter vnto Selencia, first declaring his miserable state and hard fortune, and then presenting his humble petition and request vnto him, praying him to take pitie vpon his frend, whom spitefull fortune had throwen into such B nors and Lieutenauntes of those partes, to furnish Demetrius person with all thinges neede-Pareche für full for a Princes house, and vittells sufficient to maintaine his men. But one Parocles, a grave wife man accounted, and Selenem faithfull frend also, came to tell him, that the charge to entertaine Demetrius fouldiers, was not the greatest fault he made therin, & most to be accopted of but that he did not wisely looke into his affaires, to suffer Demetrius to remaine in his conv. confidering that he had alway bene a more fierce and venturous Prince then any other, to enterprise any matters of great importance, and nowe he was brought to such dispaire and extremitie, that he had framed his men which were but ranke cowardes (contrarie to their na C ture) to be most desperat & hardie in greatest daungers. Seleucus being moued with these perfwafions, presently tooke his iorney into CILICIA with a great armie. Demetrius being aftonied with this fodaine chaunge, and dreading fo great an armie, got him to the strongest places of mount Taurus. Then he fent vnto Seleucus, first of all to pray him to suffer him to conquer certaine barbarous people thereaboutes, who lived according to their owne lawes, and neuer had king: to thend that he might yet there with fafetie end the rest of his life and exile. flaying at length in some place where he might be safe. Secondly if that liked him not, then that it woulde yet please him to vittell his men for the winter time onely, in the same place where they were, and not to be so hard harted vnto him as to drive him thence, lacking all needefull thinges, and so to put him into the mouth of his most cruell and mortall enemies. D But Selencus mistrusting his demaundes, sent vnto him that he shoulde winter if he thought good, two monethes, but no more, in the contrie of CATAONIA, so he gaue him the chiefest of his frendes for oftages: howbeit in the meane time he stopped vp all the wayes & passages going from thence into Syria. Demetrius nowe feeing him felfe kept in of all fides, like a beaft to be taken in the toyle: he was driven to trust to his owne strength. Thereuppon heouerranne the contry thereaboutes, and as often as it was his chaunce to haue any skirmish or conflict with Seleucus, he had ever the better of him: and fometime also when they draue the armed cartes with fithes against him, he ouercame them, and put the rest to slight. Then he draue them away that kept the toppe of the mountaines, and had barred the passages to kepe him that he should not goe into Syria, and so kept them him selfe. In fine, finding his mens E. hartes lift up againe, and pretily encoraged: his hart also grewe so bigge, that he determined to fight a battell with Seleucus, and to fet all at fixe and feuen. So that Seleucus was at a straight with him felfe, and wist not what to doe. For he had returned backe the ayde which Lysmachas fent vnto him, bicause he was affrayed of him, and mistrusted him. On thother side also he durst not fight with Demetrius alone, being affrayed to venter him selse with a desperate man : and also mistrusting muche his vnconstant fortune, the which having brought him to great extremitie, raised him vp againe to great prosperitie. But in the meane space Demetriss fell into a great fickenesse, the which brought his bodie very weake and low, and had almost vecely ouerthrowen his affaires. For his souldiers, some of them yeelded them seluesto his enemies, and others stale away without leave, and went where they listed. Afterwardes F when he had hardly recourred his health, and within forty dayes space was pretily growen to ftrength againe: with those few fouldiers that remained with him, he seemed to his enemies,

A that he would goe and inuade CILICIA. But then fodainly in the night without founding a ny trumpet, he remoued his campe, and went another way: and having passed ouer mount Amanus, he spoyled all the contry under it, as farre as the region of Cyrke 3 tica. But Selenem followed him, and camped hard by him. Thereuppon Demetrius fodainly armed his men. and went out by night to affault Seleucus, and to take him fleping when he mistrusted nothing.

So that Seleucus knew nothing of his stealing on him but late enough, vntil that certaine traitors of Demetrins campe that fled before, went quickly to advertise him finding him afleone.

Then Seleucus in a male and feare withall, Dementu gotvp, and sownded the alarom: and as he was putting on his hose and making him ready he eryed out, (speaking to his friends and familliers about him) we have now a cruell and dains effication R gerous beaft to deale with. Demetrius prepared him felfe to ioyne with him, and having given one of his faithfull friendes the least ding of one of the wings of his armie, him felfe led the other, and ouerthrew fome of his enemies on his fide. But Seleucus in the middest of the battell lighted from his horse, and taking his helmet from his head, he tooke a target on his arme, and went to the first ranckes of his are the had done him, gaue him yet to honorable occasion and good happe, as to make the world lewent. to knowe his clemencie & curtefie. Thereuppon immediatly he called for his officers of houshold, and commaunded them to set up his richest paullion, and to prepare all thinges meete to receive him honorably. There was one Appolonides a gentleman in Seleutus Court, who fometime had bene very famillier with Demetrius: Him Seleucus fent immediatly vnto Demetrius, to will him to be of good chere, and not to be affrayd to come to the king his Maister. for he should find him his very good friend. So soone as the kings pleasure was knowen, a few of his Courtiers went at the first to meete him, but afterwards, every man strived who should goe meete him first, bicause they were all in hope that he should presently be much made of. F and growe in credit with Seleucus. But hereby they turned Seleucus pitie into enuie, and gauge occasion also to Demetrius enemies and spitefull men, to turne the kings bowntifull good nature from him. For they put into his head many doubts and daungers, faying, that certainly fo walkes, and goodly arbors to walke or fit in, & fine parkes full of beafts where he might hune him from Selencus, to comfort him, and to put him in hope, that fo foone as Antiochus & Strahim these good newes, and as others also followed him one after another, bringing him some good words from Selencus, and that Demetrius him felf after fo great an ouerthrow (although that before he thought it a shamefull part of him to have yeelded his body into his enemies hands) chaunged his mind at that time, and began then to grow bold, & to have good hope to recouer his state againe: behold, there came one of Seleucus Captaines called Panfarianao companied with a thowfand footemen & horfemen in all, who compaffed in Demetrization them, and made the rest depart that were come vnto him before, having charge given him not to bring him to the Court, but to conuey him into CHERRONESY SOf SYRIA, whether he was brought, and euer after had a strong garrison about him to keepe him. But otherwise, Se. B leucus sent him Officers, money, and all things els meete for a Princes house: and his ordinare fare was fo delicate, that he could wishe for no more then he had . And furthermore, he had places of libertie and pleasure appointed him, both to ride his horse in, and also pleasaunt kennes, fell ficke of a difease whereof he dyed, when he was foure and fiftye yeare old. There-Cherronelus. fore was Seleucus greatly blamed, and he him felfe also did much repent him that he so suspetonice were come, they would make some good agreement and peace between them, Demetrim remaining in this estate, wrote vnto his sonne Antigonus, and to his friends and Lieuetenants which he had at CORINTHE, & ATHENS, that they should give no credit to any letters C written in his name, though his seale were to them: but that they should keepe the townes they had in charge for his sonne Antigonus, and all the rest of his forces, as if he him selfe were dead. When Antigonus heard the pitifull captinitie of his father, he maruelous greenously tooke his hard fortune, wearing blackes for forrow, and wrote vnto all the other kings, but ynto Seleucus specially, beseeching him to take him as a pledge for his father, & that he was ready to yeld up al that he kept to have his fathers libertie. The like request did many cities make unto him, and in manner all Princes, but Lysimachus: who promised Seleucus a great summe of money to put Demetrius to death. But Seleucus, who of long time had no greatfancie to Lylimachus, but rather vtterly despised him: did then thinke him the more cruell and barbarous, for this vile and wicked request he made vnto him . Wherefore he still delayed time, bicause B he would have Demetrius delivered by his fonne Antiochus and Stratonices meanes, for that Demetrius should be bownd to them for his deliuerie, and for euer should acknowledge it to them, Now for Demetrius, as he from the beginning paciently tooke his hard fortune, fo did he daily more and more forget the miserie he was in. For first of al, he gaue him selfe to riding and hunting, as farre as the place gaue him libertie. Then by litle and litle he grew to be very grosse, and to give ouer such pastimes, and therewithall he fell into dronkennes and dycing: for that in that fort he passed away the most part of his time, as it should seeme, either to avoid the greuous thoughts of his hard fortune, which came into his mind when he was fober: or els vader culler of dronkennes and eating, to shadow the thoughts he had: or els finding in him selfe that it was that manner of life he had long defired, and that through his vaine am- ! bition and follie till that time he could neuer attayne vnto, greatly turmoyling and troubling him felfe and others, supposing to find in warres, by fea & land, the felicitie and delight which he had found in ease and idlenes, when he nether thought of it, nor loked for it. For what better ende can euill and vnaduised kings and Princes looke for, of all their troubles, daungers, and warres? who in deede deceiue them felues greatly, not onely for that they followe their pleasure and delights as their chiefest felicitie, in steede of vertue and honest life: but also, bicause that in truth they can not be mery, and take their pleasure as they would. So, Demetrise after he had beneshut vp in Cherrones vs three yeares together, by ease, grossenes, & dron-cted him as he did, and that he followed not Dromichetes curtesie, a barbarous man borne in THRACIA, who had so royally and curteously intreated Lysimachus, whom he had taken priso-ener in the warres. But yet there was some tragicall pompe in the order of his funerall. For his fonne Antigonus vnderstäding that they brought him the asthes of his bodie, he tooke sea with The function all his thippes, and went to meete them, to receive them in the Iles: and when he had recei- of Demening ned them, he fet up the funerall pot of golde (in the which were his embers) uppon the poope of his Admirall galley. So, all the cities and townes whereby they passed, or harbered, some of them did put garlands of flowers about the pot, others also sent a number of men thether in mourning apparell, to accompany and honor the conuove, to the very folemnitie of his funeralls. In this fort fayled all the whole fleete towards the citie of Coningres, the pot being plainely scene farre of standing on the toppe of the Admirall galley: all the place about it being hanged about with purple, and ouer it, the diademe or royall band, and about it allowere A goodly younge men armed, which were as Pensioners to Demetrius, Furthermore, Xenophantus the famousest Musition in that time, being fet hard by it, played a sweete and lamentable songe on the flute, wherewithall the ores keeping stroke and measure, the sownd did meete with a gallant grace, as in a conuove where the mourners doe knocke their breaftes, at the foote of euery verse. But that which most made the people of CORINTHE to weepe and lament, which ranne to the peere, and all alongest the shore side to see it: was Antigonus, whom they fawe all beblubbored with teares, appartelled as a mourner in blackes. Nowe, after they had brought a wonderfull number of garlands and no legaves, and cast them uppon the funerall pot, and had folemnized all the honors possible for the funeralls at Corinthe: Antigonus caried away the pot to burye it in the citie of DEMETRIADE, the which bare the name of De-C metrius that was deade, and was a newe citie, that had bene replenished with people, and built of litle townes which are about I or cos. Demetrius left two children by his first wife Phila, to wete, Antigonus, and Stratonice: and two other sonnes, both of them named Demetrius, the one furnamed the leane, of a woman of ILLYRIA, and the other king of the CYRENIANS, of his wife Ptolemaide: and another by Deidamia called Alexander, who lived in AGYPT. And it is reported also, that he had another fonne called Corrhabus, by his wife Eurydice, and that his posteritie raigned by succession from the father to the fonne, vntil the time of Perfeus: who was the last king of Macedon, whome the Romanes ouercame by Paulus AEmylius, & wanne all the Realme of Ma-CED ON VIITO the Empire of ROME. Now that the MACEDONIAN hath played his part, give the ROMANE also leaue to come vppon the stage.

His father was an other Antonius furnamed *Cretan, who was not fo famous, nor bare any great fway in the common wealth: howbeit otherwise he was an honest man, and of a very good nature, and specially very liberall in gining, as appearently an acte he did. He was not very wealthie, and therefore his the wife would not let him whe his liberalitie and francke nature. One day a friend of his comming to him to praye him to helpe him to some money, having great neede: Antonius by chaunce had no money to giue him, but he commaunded one of his men to bringe him some water in a siluer basen, & after he had brought it him, he washed his beard as though he ment to have shauen it, and B then found an arrant for his man to fend him out, and gaue his friend the filuer basen, and bad him get him money with that. Shortly after, there was a great sturre in the house among the tented. His wife was Iulia, of the noble house and familie of Iulius Casar: who for her vertue & chastitie, was to be compared with the noblest Lady of her time. M. Antonius was brought vp vnder her, being married after her first husbands death, vnto Cornelius Lentulus, whom Cicero put to death with Cethegus, and others, for that he was of Catilines conspiracie against the common wealth. And this feemeth to be the originall cause and beginning of the cruell and C mortall hate Antonius bare vnto Cicero. For Antonius felfe fayth, that he would never give him the body of his father in law to bury him, before his mother went first to intreat Csceroes wife: the which vindoubtedly was a flat lye. For Cicero denied buriall to none of them, whom heexecuted by law. Now Antonius being a fayer younge man, and in the pryme of his youth: he Antonius cor- fell acquainted with Curio, whose friendship and acquaintance (as it is reported) was a plague vnto him. For he was a diffolute man, given over to all lust and infolencie, who to have Antonius the better at his commaundement, trayned him on into great follies, and vaine expences feruaunts, seeking out this filuer basen. Insomuch as Antonius seeing his wife maruelously of fended for it,& that the would examine all her feruaunts, one after another about it, to know what was become of it: at length he confessed he had given it away, & prayed her to be con-mon women, in rioting & banketing, So that in short time, he brought Antonius into a maruelous great det, & too great for one of his veres, to wete; of two hundred & fifty talents, for all which fumme Curio was his fuertie. His father hearing of it, did put his fonne from him. and forbad him his house. Then he fell in with Clodius, one of the desperarest and most wicked Tribunes at that time in ROME. Him he followed for a time in his desperate attempts, who bred great sturre and mischiefe in Roma: but at length he for sooke him, being weary of his rathnes and folly, or els for that he was affraid of them that were bent against Clodies. Therevonon he left IT ALY, and went into GRECE, and there bestowed the most parce of his tyme. fometime in warres, and otherwhile in the studie of eloquence. He vied a manner of phrase (rain his in his speeche, called Asiatik, which caried the best grace and estimation at that time, and pleading the was much like to his manners and life: for it was full of oftentation, foolifhe brauerie and Marik bray vaine ambition. After he had remayned there some tyme, Gabinius Proconful going into S to BIA. Derswaded him to goe with him . Antonius tolde him he would not goe as a private many Wherefore Gabinius gaue him charge of his horfemen, and so tooke him with him: So first of all he fent him against Aristobulus, who had made the Lavvasto rebell, & was the first man bus comen him selfe that got vp to the wall of a castell of his, and so draue Aristobulas out of all his holds: under Gabiand with those few men he had with him, he ouercame al the I w & s in set pattel, which were nine Procon-many against one, and put all of them almost to the sword, and furthermore, tooke Aristober Syria lushim felfe prisoner with his sonne. Afterwards Ptolomy king of EGYPT, that had bene dri- Amonius atta uen out of his contry, went vnto Gabinius to intreate him to goe with his armie with him into EGYPT, to put him againe into his kingdom: and promised him if he would goe with him. Antonius tenne thowfand talents. The most part of the Captaines thought it not best to goe thither, & Gabinius him felfe made it daintie to enter into this warre : although the couetouines of thele tenne thowfand talents stucke forely with him. But Antonius that sought but for oportunitie and good occasion to attempt great enterprises, and that defired also to gratifie Ptolomyes requelt: be went about to perswade Gabinius to goe this voyage. Now they were more affrayd of the warre belides: bicause they were to passe through deepe sandes & defert places, where was no freshe water to be had all the marisses thorough, which are called the marisses. Serbonides, which the AGYPTIANS call the exhalations or fume, by the which the Gyant Tables n breathed. But in truth it appeareth to be the overflowing of the red sea, which breaketh our under the ground in that place, where it is deuided in the narrowest place from the sea on this lide. So Antonius was fent before into Æ GYPT with his horsemen, who did not onely winne Antonius at that passage, but also tooke the citie of Parvarv M, (which is a great citie) with all the fouldi- in AEgyp ers in it: and thereby he cleared the way, and made it fafe for all the rest of the armie, and the

of the way they should goe, to come to the citie of PBLV SIVM, then they feared any dayinger the frutes of Antonius curtesie, and the desire he had to winne honor. For when Ptolony fafter he had entred into the citie of PRIVSIVM) for the malice he bare vnto the citie, would have put all the AGYPTIANS in it to the fword: Antonius withstoode him, & by no meanes would fuffer him to doe it. And in all other great battells and skirmishes which they fought, and were many in number, Antonius did many noble actes of a valliant and wife Captaine; but specially in one battell, where he compassed in the enemies behind, giving them the victorie that fought against them, whereby he afterwards had such honorable reward, as his valliantnes deserved. So was his great curteste also much commended of all, the which he shewed was to Archelaus. For having bene his very friend, he made warre with him against his will while Amonius on belived: but after his death he fought for his bodye, and gave it honorable buriall. For the for the law respects he wanne him selfe great fame of them of ALEXANDRIA, and he was also thought a being dead. worthy man of all the fouldiers in the ROMANES campe. But besides all this, be had a noble amonia presence, and shewed a countenaunce of one of a noble house: he had a goodly thicke beard, some abroad forehead, crooke nofed, and there appeared fuch a manly looke in his countenaunce. F as is commonly seene in Hercules pictures, stamped or graven in mettell. Now it had benea The house of ANTONIVS. all his doings: not onely refembling him in the likenes of his bodye, as we have fayd before A but also in the wearing of his garments. For when he would openly shewe him selfe abried before many people, he would alwayes weare his caffocke gyrt downe lowe vpon his hippes with a great fword hanging by his fide, and vpon that, some ill fauored cloke. Furthermore things that seeme intollerable in other men, as to boast commonly, to least with one or other to drinke like a good fellow with every body, to fit with the fouldiers when they dine, and to eate and drinke with them fouldierlike: it is incredible what wonderfull loue it wanne him a mongest them. And furthermore, being given to love: that made him the more defired, and by that meanes he brought many to loue him. For he would further every mans love, and alfo would not be angry that men should merily tell him of those he loued. But besides all this that which most procured his rifing and advauncement, was his liberalitie, who gave all to the fouldiers, and kept nothing for him felfe: and when he was growen to great credit, then was his authoritie and power also very great, the which notwithstanding him selfe did ouerthrowe, by a thowfand other faults he had. In this place I will shewe you one example onely of his wonderful liberalitie. He commaunded one day his coferer that kept his money, to give a friend of his 25. Myriades: which the Romanes call in their tongue, Decies. His coferer marueling at it, and being angry withall in his minde, brought him all this money in a heape together, to showe him what a maruelous masse of money it was. Antonius seeing it as he went by, asked what it was: his coferer aunswered him, it was the money he willed him to give vnto his friend. Then Antonius perceiving the fpight of his man, I thought, fayd he, that Decies had bene a greater fumme of money then it is for this is but a trifle: and therefore he C gaue his friend as much more another tyme, but that was afterwardes. Nowe the ROMANES mainteyning two factions at Rome at that tyme, one against the other, of the which, they that tooke part with the Senate, did joyne with Pompey being then in Rome: and the contrary fide taking part with the people, sent for Cafar to ayde them, who made warres in GAVLE. Then Curio Antonius friend, that had chaunged his garments, and at that tyme tooke parte with Cefar, whose enemie he had bene before : he wanne Antonius, and so handled the matter, partly through the great credit and swaye he bare amongest the people, by reason of his clo-quent tongue: and partly also by his exceeding expence of money he made which Cafer gaue him: that Amonius was chosen Tribune, and afterwards made Augure. But this wasa great helpe and furtheraunce to Cefars practifes. For fo foone as Antonius became Tribune D he did oppose him selse against those thinges which the Consul Marcellus preferred: (who ordeyned that certaine legions which had bene already leaused and billed, should be given vnto Cneus Pompey, with further commission and authoritie to leavye others vnto them) and fer downe an order, that the fouldiers which were already leavied and affembled, shouldbe Sent into Syria, for a newe supplie vnto Marcus Bibulus, who made warre at that tymeagainst the PARTHTANS. And furthermore, prohibition that Pompey should leavy no more men, and also that the souldiers should not obey him. Secondly, where Pompeys friends and followers would not suffer Cafars letters to be received, and openly red in the Senate: Antemins having power and warrant by his person, through the holines of his tribuneship, did read them openly, and made divers men change their mindes: for it appeared to them that Cofar by his letters required no vnreasonable matters. At length, when they preferred two matters of confideracion vnto the Senate, whether they thought good that Pompey, or Cafe, should leave their armie: there were few of the Senators that thought it meete Fompey should leave his armie, but they all in manner commaunded Cafar to doe it. Then Antonius rifing vp, asked whether they thought it good that Pompey and Cafar both, should leave their armies. Thereunto all the Senators iountly together gaue their whole confent, and with a great crye commending Antonius, they prayed him to referre it to the judgement of the Senate. But the Confuls would not allowe of that. Therefore Cefars friendes preferred other reasonable demaunds and requests againe, but Cato spake against them: and Lentulus, one of the Consuls draue Antonius by force out of the Senate, who at his going out made greuous curies against him. After that, he tooke a flaues gowne, and speedily fled to Casar, with Quintus Cassius; ma hyered coch. When they came to Cafar, they cryed out with open mouth, that all went hand Rome unto

A oner head at Roun: for the Tribunes of the people might not speake their mindes, and were driven away in great daunger of their lives, as many as stoode with lawe and inflice. Hereuppon Cafar incontinently went into I TALY with his army, which made Gicero fay in his Philippides: that as Hellen was cause of the warre of Troy, lowas Antonius the author of the civill warres, which in deede was a starke lye. For Cafar was not fo fickle headed, nor fo eafily caried Cicoroppe away with anger, that he would fo fodainly haue gone and made warre with his contry vpon med for hing. the fight onely of Antonius and Cassius, being fled vinto him in miserable apparell, and in a hyered coche: had he not long before determined it with him felfe. But fith in deed Cafar looked of long time but for fome culler, this came as he wished, and gaue him just occasion of watre. But to fay truely, nothing els moued him to make warre with all the world as he did but one B felfe cause, which first procured Alexander and Cyrus also before him: to wit, an insatiable defire to raigne, with a fenfeles couetoufnes to be the best man in the world, the which he could come of case not come vnto, before he had first put downe Pompey, and vtterly ouerthrowen him , Now, af- tonded to rer that Cafar had gotten Rome at his commaundement, & had driven Pampey out of ITALY, raigns. he purposed first to goe into SPAYNB, against the legions Pompey had there; and in the meane Casarambi time to make prouision for shippes and marine preparacion, to follow Pompey. In his absence, cante of the he left Lepidus that was Prætor, gouernor of Rome: and Antonius that was Tribune, he gaue civil ware. him charge of all the fouldiers, and of ITALY. Then was Antonius straight maruelously com- Cafe gone mended and beloued of the fouldiers, bicause he commonly exercised him self among them, Italy unto and would oftentimes eate and drinke with them, and also be liberall vnto them, according to C his abilitie. But then in contrary manner, he purchased divers other mens evill willes, bicause that through negligence he would not doe them inflice that were injuried, & delt yery churroade at ancher with a great armie, before the hauen of BRUNDVSIVM. For he manned out fuch a number of pynnafies, barks, and other small boates about every one of his gallies, that tonius loofing from the lande, and fayling with fafetie at his pleasure, soone after he sawe all the coastes full of shippewracks. For the force and boysterousnes of the winde, did cast away liftly with them that had any fute vnto him: and befides all this, he had an ill name to intife mens wines. To conclude, Cafars friends that gouerned vider him, were cause why they hated Casars gouernment (whichin deede in respect of him selfe was no lesse then a tyrannie) by reason of the great insolencies & outragious parts that were committed; among swhom Antonius, that was of greatest power, and that also committed greatest faultes, deserued most blame. But Cafar notwithstanding, when he returned from the warres of Spayne, made no reckoning of the complaints that were put vp against him: but contrarily, bicause he found him a hardy man, & a valliant Captaine, he employed him in his chiefest affayres, and was no D whit deceived in his opinion of him. So he paffed over the IONIAN feavnto BRUNDWSLUM. being but flenderly accompanied: & fent vnto Antonius, & Gabinius, that they should imbarke their men as foone as they could, and passe them ouer into MACEDON. Gabinius was affrayd to take the fea, bicause it was very roughe, and in the winter time: & therefore setched a great compasse about by land. But Antonius feating some daunger might comes no Cafar, bicause he was compassed in with a great number of enemies: first of all he drawe away Libe, who he draue him thence. After that, he imbarked into shippes twenty thowsand footemen, and eyght hundred horsemen, and with this armie he hoysed sayle. When the enemies sawe him, Antonius is they made out to followehim: but the sea rose so highe, that the billowes pur backe their his own of gallies that they could not come neare him, and so he scaped that daunger. But withall he fell Brandssium, uppon the rockes with his whole fleete, wherethe fea wrought very highe: fo that he was and goeth with out of all hope to faue him felfe. Yet by good fortune, fodainely the winde turned Southwest, and blewe from the gulffe, driving the waves of the river into the mayne sea. Thus day the gallies that followed him: of the which, many of them were broken and splitted, and diuers also cast away, and Antonius tooke a great number of them prisoners, with a great summe of money also. Besides all these, he tooke the citie of Lyssys, and brought Cafar a great f supplie of men, and made him coragious, comming at a pyriche with so great a power to him. Now there were divers hotte skyrmilhes and encounters, in the which Antonius fought to valliantly, that he caried the prayle from them all: but specially at two severall tymes, Another time also when Cafar attempted againe to substitute Dolabella Conful in his place, Antonius cryed out that the signes of the birdes were against it: so that at length Cafar was compelled to give him place,

For this cause he had the seconde place in the campe amonge the souldiers, and they spake of noother man vnto Cafar, but of him: who shewed playnely what opinion he had of him, when at the last battell of Pharsalia (which in deede was the last tryall of all, to give the Conqueror the whole Empire of the worlde) he him felfe did leade the right wing of his armie. and gave Antonius the leading of the left wing, as the valliantest man, and skilfullest souldier of all those he had about him. After Cesar had wonne the victorie, and that he was creof Cafars bas ated Dictator, he followed Pompey Steppe by Steppe: how beit before, he named Antonius gesell at Pharnerall of the horsemen, and sent him to Rome. The generall of the horsemen is the second office of dignitie, when the Dictator is in the citie: but when he is abroad, he is the chiefest Mr man, and almost the onely man that remayneth, and all the other officers and Magistrates are put downe, after there is a Dictator chosen. Notwithstanding, Dolabella being at that tyme Tribune; and a younge man desirous of chaunge and innonation: he preferred a law which

Dolabella had gotten the market place where the people doe affemble in counfel, & had filled it ful of armed men, intending to have this law of the newe tables to passe by force. Antonius by comaundement of the Senate, who had given him authoritie to leavy men, to vie force against Dolabella: he went against him, & fought so valliantly that men were flaine on both sides. But by this meanes, he got the il will of the comon people, & on the other fide, the noble men (as Circrofaith) did not only millike him, but also hate him for his naughty life: for they did abhor his banckers & dronke feafts he made at vnfeafonable times, & his extreme wastful expences vpon vaine light huswives, & then in the day time he would sleepe or walke out his dronkennes; thinking to weare away the fume of the aboundannee of wine which he had taken ouer D Antonius abo night. people. As for profe hereof it is reported, that at Hippias mariage, one of his leafters, he drank wine so lustely all night, that the next morning when he came to pleade before the people affembled in counsel, who had sent for him: he being quesie stomaked with his surfet he had take, was compelled to lay all before them, & one of his friends held him his gowne in flead of a basen. He had another pleasaunt player called Sergini, that was one of the chiefest men about him, & a woman also called Cytheride, of the same profession, whom he loued derely the caried her yo & downe in a litter vnto all the townes he went, & had as many men waiting apon her litter, the being but a player, as were attending upon his owne mother. It greued honest men also very much, to see that when he went into the contry, he caried with him a great number of cubbords ful of filuer & gold plate, openly in the face of the world, as it had ben the pompe or shewe of some triumphe: & that estsoones in the middest of his iorney he would set up his hales and tents hard by some greene groue or pleafaunt river, and there his Cookes should prepare him a sumpruous dinner. And furthermore, Lyons were harnesed in trases to drawe his cares : and befides also, in honest mens houses in the cities where he came, he would have common harlots, curtifans, & these tumbling gillots lodged. Now it greued men much, to see that Cafar should be out of IT ALY following of his enemies, to end this great warre, with fuch great perill and daunger: and that others in the meane time abusing his name and authorities should commit such insolent and outragious parts vnto their Citizens. This me thinkes was the cause that made the conspiracie against Casar increase more and more, and layed the revnes of the brydle vppon the fouldiers neckes, whereby they durst boldlier commit many

But Cafar mai seth the diaking as though he refused it, turned away his heade. The people were so rejoyced at it, that Cafars bead. they all clapped their hands for ioy, Antonius againe did put it on his head: Cafar againe refufed it, and thus they were striuing of and on a great while together. As oft as Antonius did put this laurell crowne vnto him, a fewe of his followers rejoyced at it: & as oft also as Casar refufed it, all the people together clapped their hands. And this was a wonderfull thing, that they fuffered all things subjects should doe by commaundement of their kings: & yet they could not abide the name of a king, detefting it as the vtter destructio of their liberty. When he faw that the people were very glad and defirous also to heare Cafar spoken of, & his praises vetered: he mingled his oration with lamentable wordes, and by amplifying of matters did greatly moue their harts and affections vnto pitie & compaffion. In

Brutus therfore & his accomplices, for fafety # of their persons were driue to fly the city. Then came all Casars friends vnto Antonius, & specially his wife Calpurnia putting her trust in him, she brought the moste part of her money into people liked his doing therein fo well, that they wayted on him home to his house, with great clapping of hands. How beit Cafar did turne the out of their offices for it. This was a good in-Cofart death, coragement for Brutus & Cassus to conspire his death, who fel into a cosort with their trustiest friends, to execute their enterprise: but yet stood doubtful whether they should make Antonio se print to it or not, Al the rest liked of it, saving Trebonius only, He told them, that when they rode to meete C.elar at his returne out of SPAYNE, Antonius & he alwaies keping company, & lying together by the way, he felt his mind a farre of but Antonius finding his meaning, would harken no more vnto it, & yet notwithstanding neuer made Casar acquainted with this talke. but had faithfully kept it to him felf, After that they could whether they should kil Antoni- G us with Cafar. But Brutus would in no wife confent to it, faying that ventring on fuch an enterprise as that for the maintenace of law & instice, it ought to be clere from all villanie. Yet they fearing Antonius power, & the authoritie of his office, appointed certain of the cofpiracy, that when Cafar were gone into the Senate, and while others should execute their enterprise, they should keepe Anionius in a talke out of the Senate house. Euen as they had deuised these matters, so were they executed: and Cafar was flaine in the middest of the Senate. Antonius being put in a feare withall, cast a slaues gowne vpon him, and hid him selfe. But afterwards when it was told him that the murtherers flue no man els, and that they went onely into the Capitoll: he fent his fonne vnto them for a pledge, & bad them boldly come downe vpon his word. The felfe fame day he did bid Cassius to supper, and Lepidus also bad Brutus. The next morning the D Senate was affembled, & Antonius him felfe preferred a lawe that all things past should be for-confirmed, and further orderned, that they should cancell none of Cafars lawes. Thus went Antonius out of the Senate more prayfed, and better esteemed, then euer man was: bicause it feemed to every man that he had cut of all occasion of civil warres, and that he had shewed him felfe a maruelous wife gouernor of the common wealth, for the appealing of these matters of so great waight & importance. But nowe, the opinion he conceiued of him selfe after he had a litle felt the good will of the people towards him, hoping thereby to make him felie the chiefest man if he might ouercome Brutus: did easily make him alter his first mind. And therefore when Cafars body was brought to the place where it should be buried, he made a E curfed murtherers. With these words he put the people into such a fury, that they presently toke Cefars body, & burnt it in the market place, with fuch tables & fourmes as they could get

A his houle, which amounted to the fumme of foure thowfand talents, & furthermore brought him al Calars bokes & writings, in the which were his memorials of al that he had done & ordevned. Antonius did daily mingle with them fuch as he thought good, and by that meanes he created newe officers, made newe Senators, called home fome that were banished, and deliuered those that were prisoners: and then he sayde that all those thinges were so appoynted and orderned by Cafar. Therefore the Romanes mocking them that were so moued, they called them Charonites: bicause that when they were ouercome, they had no other helpe why so called but to faye, that thus they were found in Cafars memorialls, who had fayled in Charons boate, and was departed. Thus Antonius ruled absolutely also in all other matters, bicause he was Conful.

But the very same night came friends, Antonius had a straunge dreame, who thought that lightning fell vpon him, & burnt his right Antonius hand. Shortly after word was brought him, that Cafar lay in waite to kil him. Cafar cleered him felfe vnto him, and told him there was no fuch matter; but he could not make Antonius beleue the contrary. Now their intent was to joyne with the legions that were on the other fide of the Mountaines, under Levidus charge: who Antonius tooke to be his friend. bicause he had holpen him to many things at Casars hand, through his meanes. When he was come to the place where Lepidus was, he camped hard by him: and when he faw that no man came to him to put him in any hope, he determined to venter him felfe, and to goe vnto Lepidus. Since the ouerthrow he had at Modena, he fuffred his beard to grow at length and neuer clypt it, that it was maruelous long, and the heare of his heade also without koming: and besides all this, he went in a mourning gowne, and after this fort came hard to the trenches R of Lepidus campe. Then he beganne to speake vnto the souldiers, and many of them their hartes yerned for pitie to fee him so poorely arrayed, and some also through his wordes beganne to pitie him: infomuch that Lepidus beganne to be affrayd, and therefore commaunded all the trompetts to found together to stoppe the fouldiers cares, that they should not harken to Antonius. This notwithstanding, the souldiers tooke the more pitie of him, & spake fecretly with him by Clodius & Lelius meanes, whom they fent vnto him difguifed in womens apparel, & gaue him counsel that he should not be affraid to enter into their campe, for there were a great number of fouldiers that would receive him, and kill Lepidus, if he would fay the word, Antonius would not fuffer them to hurt him, but the next morning he went with his ari my to wade a ford, at a litle river that ranne betweene them: and him felfe was the foremost of man that tooke the river to get over, feeing a number of Lepidus campe that gave him their handes, plucked up the stakes, and layed stat the bancke of their trenche to let him in to their in deede Antonius did all, and ruled the whole army, yet he alway gaue Lepidus the name and remayned three dayes together. Now as touching all other matters, they were eafily agreed, &did deuide all the Empire of Roma betwene them, as if it had bene their owne inheritance. But yet they could hardly agree whom they would put to death: for every one of them would kill their enemies, and faue their kinfmen and friends. Yet at length, giuing place to their gredy desire to be revenged of their enemies, they spurned all reverence of bloud, and holines of R friendship at their feete. For Cesar left Cicero to Antonius will, Antonius also forsooke Lucius Cafar, who was his Vncle by his mother: and both of them together fuffred Lepidus to kill his owne brother Paulus. Yet some writers affirme, that Casar & Antonius requested Paulus might be flain, & that Lepidus was conteted with it. In my opinion there was neuer a more horrible, vnnatural,& crueller chaunge then this was. For thus chaunging murther for murther, they did aswel kill those whom they did forsake & leaue vnto others, as those also which others left vnto them to kil:but fo much more was their wickednes & cruelty great vnto their friends, for that they put them to death being innocents, & having no cause to hate them. After this plat was agreed ypon betwene the the fouldiers that were thereabouts, would have this friendship & league betwixt them confrmed by mariage, & that Cefar (hould mary Claudia, the daughter F of Fuluia, & Antonius wife. This mariage also being agreed vpon, they condened three hudred of the chiefest citizens of Rome, to be put to death by proscriptio. And Antonius also comainA ded the so who he had genen comission to kil Cicero, that they should strik of his head & right Amonius hand, with the which he had written the inuective Orations (called Philippides lagainst Anto- quely mis miss. So whe the murtherers brought him Ciceroes head & hand cut of he beheld them along time with greation, & laughed hartily, & that oftentimes for the greation he felt. Then when he had taken his pleasure of the fight of them, he caused them to be set up in an open place, ouer the pulpit for Orations (where when he was aliue, he had often spoken to the people) as if he had done the dead man hurt, and not bleamished his owne fortune, shewing him selfe (to his great shame and infamie) a cruell man, and voworthie the office and authoritie he bare. His vncle Lucius Cafar also, as they fought for him to kill him, and followed him hard, fledde vnto his fifter. The murtherers comming thither, forcing to breake into her chamber, the R floode at her chamber dore with her armes abroade, crying out ftill; you shall not kill Excise Lucius casars Cafar, before you first kill me, that bare your Captaine in my wombe. By this meanes she sa . Life faued, by ued her brothers life. Now the gouernment of these Triumuiri grewe odious and hatefull to the ROMANES, for divers respects: but they most blamed Antonius, bicause he being elder then Antonius Cafar, and of more power and force then Lepidus, gave him felle againe to his former riot and viot in him excesse, when he lest to deale in the affaires of the common wealth. But setting aside the ill rete. name he had for his infolencie, he was yet much more hated in respect of the house he dwelt in, the which was the house of Pompey the great: a man as famous for his temperature, mo- The praise of destie, and civill life, as for his three triumphes. For it grieved them to see the gates common- Pompey the ly shut against the Captaines, Magistrates of the citie, and also Ambassadors of straungena-

For they did not onely fell by the crier, the goods of those whom they had outlawed, and appointed to murther, slaunderously deceived the poore widowes and young orphanes, & also raised all kind of imposts, subsidies, and taxes; but vnderstanding also that the holy vestall Nunnes had certaine goods & money put in their custodie to keepe, both of mens in the citie, and those also that were abroade: they went thither, and tooke them away by force. Oftauins Cafar perceiving that no money woulde ferue Antonius turne, he prayed that they might deuide the money between them, and so did they n also deuide the armie, for them both to goe into Macedon to make warre against Brutus and Casius: and in the meane time they left the government of the citie of Rome vnto Lepidus. When they had passed ouer the seas, and that they beganne to make warre, they being both camped by their enemies, to wit, Antonius against Cassius, and Casar against Brutus: Galar did no great matter, but Antonius had alway the upper hand, and did all. Furthermore, he tooke measure of the temple of Apollo Pythias, and promised the Senate to finish it. But when he was once come into Asia, having left Lucius Cenforinus Governor in GRECE. and that he had felt the riches and pleasures of the East partes, and that Princes, great Lordes and Kinges, came to waite at his gate for his comming out, and that Queenes and Princeffes to excell one an other, gaue him verie riche presentes, and came to see him, curiously setting forth them selues, and vsing all art that might be to shewe their beawtie, to win his fauor the more: (Cefar in the meane space turmoyling his wits and bodie in civill warres at home, Antonius liuing merily & quietly abroad) he easely fell againe to his old licetious life. For straight C one Anaxenor a player of the citherne, Xoutus a player of the flutes, Metrodorus a tombler, and fuch a rabble of minstrells & fit ministers for the pleasures of Asia, (who in finenes & flattery passed all the other plagues he brought with him out of ITALIE) all these flocked in his court, & bare the whole sway: & after that, all went awry. For every one gave them selves to riot and

of in one of his tragedies: VV as full of sveete perfumes, and pleasant songs, With vvoefull vveping mingled thereamongs.

For in the citie of Ephesys, women attyred as they goe in the feaftes and facrifice of Baschus, came out to meete him with such solemnities & ceremonies, as are then vsed: with men D and children difguifed like Fawnes and Satyres. Moreouer, the citie was full of Iuey, & darts wreathed about with Iuey, pfalterions, flutes and howboyes, and in their fonges they called him Bacchus, father of mirth, curteous, and gentle: and so was he vnto some, but to the most parte of men, cruell, and extreame. For he robbed noble men and gentle men of their goods, to geue it vnto vile flatterers: who oftentimes begged mens goods liuing, as though they had bene dead, and would enter their houses by force. As he gaue a citizens house of MAGNESIA vnto a cooke, bicause (as it is reported) he dressed him a fine supper. In the ende he doubled the taxacion, and imposed a seconde vpon Asia. But then Hybraus the Orator sent from the estates of Asra, to tell him the state of their contrie, boldly fayd vnto him: if thou wilt have power to lay two tributes in one yere vpon vs, thou shouldest also have power to gene vs two B fommers, two autumnes, and two haruests. This was gallantly and pleasauntly spoken vnto Antonius by the Orator, and it pleased him well to heare it: but afterwardes amplifying his speache, he spake more boldly, and to better purpose. Asia hath payed the two hundred thowsand talents. If all this money be not come to thy cofers, then aske accompt of them that leaused it: but if thou have received it, and nothing be left of it, then are we viterly vidone. Hybraas words nettled Antonius roundly. For he vnderstoode not many of the thests and robberies his officers committed by his authoritie, in his treasure and affaires: not so muche bicause he was carelesse, as for that he ouersimply trusted his men in all things. For he was a plaine man, without futtletie, and therefore ouerlate founde out the fowle faultes they committed against him: but when he heard of them, he was muche offended, and would plainly confesse it vnto them whome his officers had done injurie vnto, by countenaunce of his authoritie. He had a noble minde, as well to punish offendors, as to reward well doers: and yet

A hedid exceede more in gening, then in punishing. Now for his outragious manner of railing he commonly vied, mocking and flouring of euerie man: that was remedied by it felfe. For a Amonito man might as boldly exchaunge a mocke with him, & he was as well cotented to be mocked, as to mock others. But yet it oftentimes marred all. For he thought that those which told him fo plainly, & truly in mirth: would neuer flatter him in good earnest, in any matter of weight.

But thus he was easely abused by the praises they gaue him, not finding howe these flatterers mingled their flatterie, vnder this familiar and plaine manner of speach vnto him, as a fine deuise to make difference of meares with sharpe and tart sauce, & also to kepe him by this franke ieasting & bourding with him at the table, that their common flatterie should not be trouble-fome vnto him, as men do easely mislike to have too muche of one thing: and that they handled him finely thereby, when they would geue him place in any matter of waight, and follow his counsell, that it might not appeare to him they did it so muche to please him, but bicause they were ignoraunt, and vnderstoode not so muche as he did. Antonius being thus inclined, the last and extreamest mischiese of all other (to wit, the love of Cleopatra) lighted on himwho did waken and stirre vp many vices yet hidden in him, and were neuer feene to any; and if any sparke of goodnesse or hope of rising were left him, Cleopatra quenched it straight, and made it worfe then before. The manner how he fell in loue with her was this. Antonius going to make warre with the PARTHIANS, sent to commaunde Cleopatra to appeare personally be- Amonius lone fore him, when he came into Cilicia, to aunswere vnto suche accusacions as were layed a- whom he sem gainst her, being this: that she had aided Cassius and Brutus in their warre against him. The for into Citi-

could possible, and bad her not to be affrayed at all of Antonius, for he was a more curteous Lord, then any that she had ever seene. Cleopatra on thother side beleving Dellius wordes, and geffing by the former accesse and credit she had with Iulius Casar, and Cneus Pompey (the sonne of Pompey the great) only for her beawtie: she began to have good hope that she might more easely win Antonius. For Casar and Pompey knew her when she was but a young thing, & knew

D not then what the worlde ment: but nowe she went to Antonius at the age when a womans beautie is at the prime, and the also of best judgement. So, the furnished her selfe with a world of gifts, store of gold and filuer, and of riches and other fumptuous ornaments, as is credible enough the might bring from fo great a house, and from so wealthie and rich a realme as A-GYPT was. But yet the caried nothing with her wherein the trufted more then in her felfe, and women also, the fairest of them were apparelled like the nymphes Nereides (which are the mermaides of the waters) and like the Graces, some stearing the helme, others tending the tackle and ropes of the barge, out of the which there came a wonderfull paffing sweete sauor of perfumes, that perfumed the wharfes side, pestered with innumerable multitudes of people. Some of them followed the barge all alongest the rivers side: others also ranne out of the citie to see her comming in. So that in thend, there ranne such multitudes of people one after an other to fee her, that Antonius was left post alone in the market place, in his Imperial seate to geue audience: and there went a rumor in the peoples mouthes, that the goddeffe Penus messenger sent vnto Cleopatra to make this summons vnto her, was called Dellius: who when it he had throughly confidered her beawtie, the excellent grace and sweetenesse of her tongue, he nothing mistrusted that Antonius would doe any hurte to so noble a Ladie, but rather affured him felfe, that within few dayes the should be in great fauor with him. Thereupon he did her great honor, and perswaded her to come into CILICIA, as honorably furnished as she in the charmes and inchauntment of her passing beawtie and grace. Therefore when she was fent vnto by divers letters, both from Antonius him felfe, and also from his frendes, the made folight of it, and mocked Antonius fo much, that she disdained to set forward otherwise, but The ronderlanded, Antonius fent to inuite her to supper to him. But the fent him word againe, he should doe better rather to come and suppe with her. Antonius therefore to shew him selfe curteous: vnto her at her arrivall, was contented to obey her, & went to supper to her: where he found fuch passing sumptuous fare, that no tongue can expresse it. But amongest all other thinges he most wondered at the infinite number of lightes and torches hanged on the toppe of the house, geuing light in eueric place, so artificially set and ordered by deuises, some round, some fquare: that it was the rarest thing to behold that eye could discerne, or that euer books could mencion. The next night, Antonius fealting her, contended to passe her in magnificence and finenes: but she ouercame him in both. So that he him selfe began to skorne the grosse service: of his house, in respect of Cleopatraes sumptuousnes and finenesse. And when Cleopatra found & Antonius leasts and slents to be but grosse, and souldier like, in plaine manner: she gaue it him finely, and without feare taunted him throughly. Now her beawtie (as it is reported) was not fo paffing, as vnmatchable of other women, nor yet fuche, as vpon prefent viewe did enamor. men with her: but so sweete was her companie and conversacion, that a man could not posfiblie but be taken. And besides her beawtie, the good grace she had to talke and discourse. her curteous nature that tempered her words & dedes, was a spurre that pricked to the quicked Furthermore, befides all these, her voyce and words were maruelous pleasant: for her tongue was an inftrument of muficke to divers foorts and pastimes, the which the eafely turned to any language that pleased her. She spake vnto sew barbarous people by interpreter, but made them auniwere her selfe, or at the least the most parte of them: as the ÆTHIOPIANS, the A- C. RABIANS, the TROGLODYTES, the HEBRYES, the SYRIANS, the MEDES, and the PARTHE-ANS, and to many others also, whose languages she had learned. Whereas divers of her progenitors, the kings of Æ GYPT could fearce learne the Æ GYPT IAN tongue only and many of them forgot to speake the MACEDONIAN. Nowe, Antonius was so rausshed with the loue of Cleopatra, that though his wife Fuluia had great warres, and much a doe with Cafar for his affaires, and that the armie of the PARTHIANS, (the which the kings Lieutenauntes had genen) to the onely leading of Labienus) was now affembled in MESOPOTAMIA readie to inuade Sy-RIA: vet, as though all this had nothing touched him, he veelded him felfe to goe with Cleapatra into ALEXANDRIA, where he spent and lost in childish sports, (as a man might say) and idle pastimes, the most pretious thing a man can spende, as Antiphon sayth: and that is, time. D For they made an order between them, which they called Amimetobion (as much to fay, no life comparable and matcheable with it) one feafting ech other by turnes, and in cost, exceeding all measure and reason. And for proofe hereof, I have heard my grandsather Lampry as report, that one Philotas a Philition, borne in the citie of AMPHISSA, told him that he was at that present time in ALEXANDRIA, and studied Phisicke: and that having acquaintance with and Cleorara One of Antonius cookes, he tooke him with him to Antonius house, (being a young man defirous to fee things) to shew him the wonderfull sumptuous charge and preparation of one only supper. When he was in the kitchin, and faw a world of diversities of meates, and amongst others, eight wilde boares rosted whole: he began to wonder at it, and sayd, sure you have great number of ghests to supper. The cooke fell a laughing, and answered him, no (a he)not & many ghestes, nor aboue twelve in all: but yet all that is boyled or roasted must be served in whole, or elfe it would be marred straight. For Antonius peraduenture will suppe presently, or it may be a pretie while hence, or likely enough he will deferre it longer, for that he hath dronke well to day, or elfe hath had some other great matters in hand; and therefore we doe not dreffe one supper only, but many suppers, bicause we are vicerteine of the houre he will fuppe in. Philotas the Philition tolde my grandfather this tale, and fayd moreouer, that it was his chaunce shortly after to serue the eldest some of the sayd Antonius, whome he had by his wife Fuluia: and that he fate commonly at his table with his other frendes, when he did not dine nor suppe with his father. It chaunced one day there came a Phisition that was so full of words, that he made every man wearie of him at the bord: but Philotas to stoppe his mouth, put out a futtle proposition to him. It is good in some forte to let a man drinke colde water that hath an agew: euerie man that hath an agew hath it in some sorte, ergo it is good for a

ANTONIVS. Aman that hath an agew to drinke cold water. The Philition was fo grauelled and amated withall, that he had not a word more to fay, Young Antonius burft out in fuch a laughing at him. and was fo glad of it, that he fayd vnto him : Philotas, take all that, I geue it thee: Thewing him his cubbord full of plate, with great pots of gold and filuer. Philosas thanked him, and told him he thought himselfe greatly boud to him for this liberality, but he would never have thought that he had had power to have geven to many things, and of to great value. But muche more he maruelled, when shortly after one of young Antonius men brought him home all the pots in a basket, bidding him fer his marke and stampe upon them, and to locke them up. Philotat returned the bringer of them, fearing to be reproued if he tooke them. Then the young contleman Antonius fayd vnto him; alas poore man, why doest thou make it nife to take them? Knowest thou not that it is the sonne of Antonius that geues them thee, and is able to do it? If thou wilt not beleue me, take rather the readie money they come to: bicause my father peraduenture may aske for some of the plate, for the antike & excellent workemanship of them. This I have heard my grandfather tell oftentimes. But now againe to Cleopatra. Plato wryteth Plate with that there are foure kinds of flatterie: but Cleopatra deuided it into many kinds, For the were of foure kinds it in foort, or in matter of earnest, still deuised fundrienew delights to have Antonius at com- Chepara maundement, neuer leaning him night nor day, nor once letting him go out of her fight. For Queene of at the would play at dyce with him, drinke with him, and hunt commonly with him, and also be farmer. with him when he went to any exercise or activity of body. And somtime also, when he would goe vp and downe the citie difguifed like a flaue in the night, & would peere into poore mens windowes & their shops, and scold & brawle with them within the house: Cleopatra would be also in achamber maides array, & amble vp & downe the streets with him, so that oftentimes Antonius bare away both mockes & blowes. Now, though most men misliked this maner, yet the ALEXANDRIANS were commonly glad of this jolity, & liked it well, faying verie gallantly, and wifely: that Antonius shewed them a commicall face, to wit, a merie countenaunce: and the ROMANES a tragicall face, to fay, a grimme looke. But to reckon vp all the foolishe sportes they made, reuelling in this forte: it were too fond a parte of me, and therefore I will only tell you one among the rest. On a time he went to angle for fish, and when he could take Anionius s. none, he was as angrie as could be, bicause Cleopatra stoode by. Wherefore he lecretly com- fing in All-

maunded the fisher men, that when he cast in his line, they should straight dive vnder the war 27th. ter, and put a fishe on his hooke which they had taken before; and so snatched up his angling rodde, and brought vp fish twife or thrife. Cleopatra found it straight, yet she seemed not to see it, but wondred at his excellent fishing: but when she was alone by her selfe among her owne people, the told them howe it was, and bad them the next morning to be on the water to fee the fifthing. A number of people came to the hauen, and got into the fifther boates to fee this fishing. Antonius then threw in his line and Cleopatra straight commaunded one of her men to diue vnder water before Antonius men, and to put fome old falte fish vpon his baite, like vnto those that are brought out of the contrie of Pont. When he had hong the fish on his hooke. Antonius thinking he had taken a fishe in deede, snatched up his line presently. Then they all fella laughing. Cleopatra laughing alfo, said vnto him: leaue vs(my Lord) Æ 9 YPTIANS (Which dwell in the contry of PHARVS and CANOBYS) your angling rodde: this is not thy profession; thou must huntrafter conquering of realmes and contries. Nowe Antonina delighting in these fond and childish pastimes, verie ill newes were brought him from two places. The first from ROME, that his brother Lucius, and Fuluia his wife, fell out first between them selues, and afterwards fell to open warre with Cafar, & had brought all to nought, that they were both driven This warre of to flie out of ITALIE. The seconde newes, as bad as the first that Labienus conquered all A- Lucius Ango SIA with the armie of the PARTHIANS, from the river of Euphrates, and from Syntagento alla control the contries of Lydia and Ionia. Then began Antonius with much a doc, a litleto route him official ca felfe as if he had bene wakened out of a deepe fleepe, and as a man may fay, comming out of far. a great dronkennes. So, first of all he bent him felfe against the PARTHIAMS, and went as farre Fasthe contrie of Pinonni CIA: but there he received lamentable letters from his wife Fulcia. Whereuppon he ftraight returned towards I T A LIE, with two hundred faile; and as he went, tooke up his frendes by the way that fled out of I T ALIE, to come to him. By them he was infaw Cafar asked nothing of him, and that Antonius on the other fide layed all the fault & home den on his wife Fuluia: the frendes of both parties would not fuffer them to vnrippe any older matters, and to proue or defend who had the wrong or right, and who was the first procine since the death of his wife Fuluia. For he denied not that he kept Cleopatra, but so did he not confesse that he had her as his wife: & so with reason he did defend the lone he bare vnto this

For when Antonius landed in ITALIE, and that then of this warre, fearing to make matters worfe between them: but they made them frendesun gether, and deuided the Empire of Roug between them, making the fea Ionium the bounds of their division. For they gave all the provinces Eastward, vnto Antonius: and the contries All the Empire of Rome denided be-Westward, vnto Cafar: and left A FRICKE vnto Lepidus: and made a law, that they three one after an other should make their frendes Consuls, when they would not be them selves Tillis mene she feemed to be a found counfell, but yet it was to be confirmed with a straighter bonde, which Triumiri. Alex at Rome although it was against the law, that a widow should be maried within tenne monethes after her husbandes death. Howbeit the Senate difpenfed with the law, and so the mariage process ded accordingly. Sextus Pompeius at that time kept in Sicilia, and fo made many an inrode rid offmin, iffto I TALIB with a great number of pynnasies and other pirates shippes, of the which were Octavius Cz. Captaines two notable pirats, Menas, and Menecrates, who fo scoored all the sea thereabouts, that none durst peepe out with a fayle. Furthermore, Sextus Pompeius had delt verie frendly D with Antonius, for he had curteously received his mother, when the fled out of I TALLE with Amonius and Fullis and therefore they thought good to make peace with him. So they met all three too gether by the mount of Milena, youn a hill that runneth farreinto the fea : Pompey having his Thippes ryding hard by at ancker, and Antonius and Cafar their armies upon the shoare side dis Sexus Pom- rectly ouer against him. Now, after they had agreed that Sextus Pompeius should have Sicili and San DINIA, with this condicion that he should ridde the sea of all theeues and pirats, and make it fafe for paffengers, and withall that he should send a certaine of wheate to Rome some of them did feafe an other and drew cuts who should beginne. It was Pompeius chaunce to inwhite them first. Whereupon Antonius asked him: & where shall we supper There, said Pomper and thewed him his admirall galley which had fix bankes of owers: that (fayd he) is my fathers Sexus Pom- fiousettiev haut left me. He spake it to taunt Antonius, bicause he had his fathers house, that Peint taunt to was Fompey the great. So he cast ankers enowe into the sea, to make his galley fast, and their built bridge of wodde to convey them to his galley, from the heade of mount Mifena hard Sexual Port there he welcomed them, and made them great cheere. Now in the middelt of the feast, when they fell to be merie with Antonius loue vnto Cleopatra: Menas the pirate came to Pompey, and whispering in his care, said vnto him: shall I cut the gables of the ankers, and make thee Lord not only of Sicile and Sardinia, but of the whole Empire of Rome besides ? Pomper har uing pawfed a while vpon it, at length aunswered him: thou shouldest have done it, and neuer have told it me, but now we must content vs with that we have. As for my felfe, I was never taught to breake my faith, nor to be counted a traitor. The other two also did likewise feat him in their campe, and then he returned into Sicile. Antonius after this agreement made fent Ventidius before into Asia to flay the Parthians, and to keepe them they should come no further : and he him felfe in the meanetime, to gratefie C.clar, was contented to be chosen Inline Cafars prieft and facrificer, & fo they joyntly together dispatched all great matters, concerning the state of the Empire. But in all other maner of sportes and exercises, wherein they passed the time away the one with the other: Antonius was cuer inferior vnto Casar and alway loft which grieued him much. With Antonius there was a foothfayer or aftronomer of E-GYT, that coulde cast a figure, and judge of mens nativities, to tell them what should happen to them. He, either to please Gleopatra, or else for that he founde it fo by his art, told Antonius plainly, that his fortune (which of it felfe was excellent good, and very great) was altogether bleamifhed, and obscured by Casars fortune: and therefore he counselled him viterly to leave Amenim told his company, and to get him as farre from him as he could. For thy Demon faid he, (that is to fare, that his R (av. the good angell and spirit that kepeth thee) is affraied of his; and being coragious & high fortune year when he is alone, becometh fearefull and timerous when he commeth neere wnto the other. infinite value Howfoeuer it was, the euents enfuing proued the ÆGYPTIAN'S words true. For it is faid, that as often as they two drew cuts for pattime, who should have any thing, or whether they plaied Anunium at dice, Antonius alway lost. In fine, he recommended the affaires of his house vnto far. Eafar, & went out of ITALIE with Octavia his wife, whom he caried into GRECE, after he had had a daughter by her. So Antonius lying all the winter at ATHENS, newes came vnto him of the victories of Ventidius, who had ouercome the PARTHIANS in battel, in the which also were flaine. Labienus, and Pharnabates, the chiefest Captaine king Orodes had, For these good newes Orodes king he feasted all A THENS, and kept open house for all the GRACIANS, and many games of price of Parth were plaied at ATHENS, of the which he him felfe would be judge. Wherfore leaving his gard, his axes, and tokens of his Empire at his house, he came into the show place (or listes) where these games were played, in a long gowne and slippers after the GRECIAN facion, and they caried tippestaues before him, as marshalls men do cary before the Judges to make place; and he himselfe in person was a stickler to part the young men, when they had fought enough. After that, preparing to go to the warres, he made him a garland of the holy Olive, and caried a vessell with him of the water of the fountaine Clepsydra, bicause of an Oracle he had recei-Dued that fo commaunded him. In the meane time, Ventidius once againe ouercame Pacorus, Venudius no (Orodes sonne king of PARTHIA) in a battell fought in the contrie of CYRRESTICA, he being of the Para come againe with a great armie to inuade Syria: at which battell was flaine a great number this of the PARTHIANS, & among them Pacorus, the kings owne some slaine. This noble exploye The death of as famous as euer any was, was a full reuenge to the Romans, of the shame and losse they king of Par had received before by the death of Marcus Craffus: and he made the PARTHIANS flie, and thines fames glad to kepe them felues within the confines and territories of MES OFOTAMIA, and MEDIA. after they had thrife together bene ouercome in feuerall battells. Howbeit Ventidius durft not vnderrake to follow them any further, fearing least he should have gotten Antonius displeasure by it, Notwithstanding, he led his armie against them that had rebelled, and conquered them E againe: amongest whome he besieged Antiochus, king of Commag ana, who offered him to give a thowfand talentes to be pardoned his rebellion, and promifed ever after to be at Antonius commaundement. But Ventidius made him aunswere, that he should send vnto Antonius. who was not farre of, and would not fuffer Ventidius to make any peace with Antiochus, to the end that yet this litle exployt should passe in his name, and that they should not thinke he did any thing but by his Lieutenaunt Ventidius. The fiege grew verie long, bicause they that were in the towne, feeing they coulde not be received you no reasonable composition: determined valliantly to defende them selues to the last man. Thus Antonius did nothing, and yet receiued great shame, repenting him much that he tooke not their first offer. And yet at last he was glad to make truce with Antiochiu, and to take three hundred talentes for composition. Penname in only men of F Thus after he had fet order for the state & affaires of Syria, he returned againe to Athens: the Romanus, and having given Ventidius suche honors as he deserved, he sent him to Rome, to triumphe that min for the PARTHIANS. Ventidius was the only man that euer triumphed of the PARTHIANS VI- Parties.

The wirder of She tooke them afide, and with all the instance she could possible, intreated them they would not fuffer her that was the happiest woman of the world, to become nowe the most wretched and vnfortunatest creature of all other. For now, faid she, euerie mans eyes doe gaze on me, that am the fifter of one of the Emperours and wife of the other. And if the worlf councell of take place, (which the goddes forbidde) and that they growe to warres: for your felues, it is vncertaine to which of them two the goddes have affigned the victorie, or overthrowe. But for me, on which fide focuer victorie fall, my ftate can be but most miserable still. These words of Octavia so softned Cafars harte, that he went quickely vnto TARENTVM. But it was a noble fight for them that were present, to see so great an armie by lande not to sturre, and so many Thippes aflore in the roade, quietly and fafe: and furthermore, the meeting and kindeneffe of frendes, louinglie imbracing one an other, First, Antonius feasted Calar, which he graunted vnto for his fifters fake. Afterwardes they agreed together, that Cafar should geue Antonins two legions to go against the PARTHIANS: and that Antonius should let Casar have a hundred gallies armed with brasen spurres at the proces. Besides all this, Ottauia obteyined of her 10 husbande, twentie brigantines for her brother: and of her brother for her husbande, a thowfande armed men. After they had taken leave of eache other, Cafar went immediatly to make warre with Sextus Pompeius, to gette Sicilia into his handes. Antonius also leaving his wife Octavia and litle children begotten of her, with Cafar, and his other children which he had by Fuluia: he went directlie into A sia. Then beganne this peftilent plague and mischiefe of Cleopatraes loue (which had flept a longe tyme, and feemed to have bene viter-Plato calleth lie forgotten, and that Amonius had geuen place to better counsell) agains to kindle, and escupiscences to be in force, so soone as Antonius came neere vnto Syria. And in the ende, the horse of the minde as Plato termethit, that is so hard of rayne (I meane the vnreyned lust of concupifcence) did put out of Antonius heade, all honeft and commendable thoughtes: for he fent Fonteius Cavito to bring Cleopatra into Syria. Vnto whome, to welcome her, he gaus no trifling things: but vnto that the had already, he added the provinces of Phoenicia, those of the nethermost Syria, the lle of Cyprvs, and a great parte of Cilicia, and that contry of INRIE where the true balme is, and that parte of ARABIA where the NABATHEIANS doe dwell, which stretcheth out towardes the Ocean. These great giftes muche misliked the Ro-MANE S. But now, though Antonius did eafely geue away great feigniories, realmes, & mighty nations ynto fome private men, and that also he tooke from other kings their lawfull realmest (as from Antigonus king of the Inwas, whom he openly beheaded, where neuer king before had fuffred like death) yet all this did not so much offend the Romanes, as the vnmeasurable honors which he did vnto Cleopatra. But yet he did much more aggranate their malice & il wil towards him, bicause that Cleopatra having brought him two twinnes, a sonne and a daughter; he named his sonne Akwander, & his daughter Cleopatra, and gaue them to their surnames; the

A Sume to the one, & the moone to the other. This not withflanding, he that could finely cloke his shamefull deedes with fine words, faid that the greatnes & magnificence of the Empire of ROME appeared most not where the ROMANES tooke, but where they gave much : & nobilities was multiplied amongest men, by the posterity of kings, when they left of their seede in diness places: and that by this meanes his first auncester was begotten of Hersules, who had not less the hope and continuance of his line and posterity, in the wombe of one only woman; searing Solons lawes, or regarding the ordinaunces of men touching the procreacion of children but that he gaue it vnto nature, and established the fundacion of many noble races and families in divers places. Nowe when Phraortes had flaine his father Orodes, and possessed the kingdoms Phraorte many gentlemen of PARTHIA forfooke him, and fled from him. Amongft them was Manufes, flue his father problems and of great authority among his contry men, who came was described by Order king B anoble man, and of great authority among his contry men, who came vnto Amonius, that we of Prifes ceined him, & compared his fortune vnto Themistocles, and his owne riches & magnificence vnto the kings of Persia. For he gaue Monefes three cities, Larissa, Arethysa, & Hiera POLIS, which was called before BOMBYCE. Howbeit the king of PARTHIA (hortly after called him home againe, vpon his faith & word. Antonius was glad to let him go, hoping thereby to steale vpon Phraortes vnprouided. For he sent vnto him, & told him that they would remaine good frends, & haue peace together, so he would but only redeliuer the standerds & ensignes of the ROMANES, which the PARTHIANS had wonne in the battell where Marcus Crassus was flaine, & the men also that remained yet prisoners of this ouerthrow. In the meane time he sent Cleopatra backe into ÆGYPT, & tooke his way towards ARABIA & ARMENIA. & theretooke 1 a general muster of all his army he had together, & of the kings his cofederats that were come by his comaundement to aide him, being a maruelous number : of the which the chiefest was Artanafdes, king of Armenia, who did furnish him with fix thowsande horsemen, and seven thowland footenen. There were also of the Romanus about three score thowland footmens Antonius & of horsemen (Spaniards & Gavles reckoned for Romans) to the number of ten thous great of pulfand, & of other nations thirty thow fand men, reckoning together the horsemen and light art fant army. med footemen. This fo great & puisant army which made the Indians quake for feare dwelling about the contry of the BACTRIANS, and all As IA also to tremble: served him to no purpole, & all for the loue he bare to Cleopatra. For the earnest great desire he had to lye all winter Annulus with her, made him begin his warre out of due time, and for hast, to put all in hazard, being so the lower and to the lower of the lowe D rauished & enchaunted with the sweete poyson of her loue, that he had no other thought but classana. of her, & how he might quickly returne againe:more then how he might ouercome his enemies. For first of all, where he should have wintered in ARMENIA to refresh his men, wearied with the long iorney they had made having comen eight thowfand furlongs, and then at the beginning of the spring to go and inuade MEDIA, before the PARTHEAN'S should stirre out of their houses & garrisons: he could tary no lenger, but led them forthwith vnto the province of ATROPATENE, leaving ARMENIA on the left hand, & forraged al the contry. Furthermore, making all the haft he coulde, he left behinde him engines of battery which were carried with him in three hudred carts, (among the which also there was a ramme foure score foote long) being things most necessary for him, and the which he could not get againe for money if they were once lost or marred. For the hie prouince As ra haue no trees growing of such height and length, neither strong nor straight enough to make such like engines of battery. This notwithflanding, he left them all behind him, as a hinderance to bring his matters & intent specdily to passe: and left a certaine number of men to keepe them, and gaue them, in charge with one Tatianus. Then he went to besiege the citie of PHRAATA, being the chiefest and greatest Antonius Secitie the king of Media had, where his wife and children were. Then he straight founde his seguither de ownefault, and the want of his artillerie he left behinde him, by the worke he had in hande: " or " on Media. for he was fayne for lacke of a breache (where his men might come to the sworde with their enemies that defended the walle) to force a mount of earth hard to the walles of the citie, the which by litle and litle with greate labour, rose to some height. In the meane time king Phraortes came downe with a great armie: who understanding that Antonias had left his engines of batterie behind him, he fent a great number of horfemen before, which enuironed Tatianus with all his cariage, and flue him, and ten thow fand men he had with him, After this

This discomfiture maruelously troubled all As. toning army, to receive fo great an overthrow (beyond their expectacion) at the beginning of their iorney: infomuche that Artabazus, king of the Armantans, dispairing of the good lieceffe of the ROMANES: departed with his men, notwithstanding that he was him selle the first procurer of this warre and iorney. On the other fide, the PARTHIANS came coragiously vnto Antonius campe, who lay at the fiege of their chiefest citie, and cruelly reuiled and threatned him. Antonius therefore fearing that if he lay still and did nothing, his mens harts would faile them: he tooke ten legions, with three cohorts or enlignes of the Prætors, (which are companies appointed for the gard of the Generall) and all his horsemen, and caried them out to forrage, hoping therby he should easely allure the PARTHIANS to fight a battell. But when he B had marched about a dayes iomey from his campe, he faw the PARTHIANS wheeling round about him to geue him the onset, & to skirmish with him, when he would thinke to march his way. Therefore he fet out his fignall of battell, & yet caused his tents and fardells to be truffed vo as though he ment not to fight, but only to lead his men back againe. Then he marched be-and commaunded his horsemen, that as soone as they thought the legions were nere enough voto their enemies to fet voon the voward, that then they should fet spurres to their horses,& Battell bebegin the charge. The PARTHIANS standing in battell ray, beholding the countenaunce of the twext i're Parshian

For in their march, they kept the rankes a like space one from an o- C ther, not straggling out of order, and shaking their pikes, speaking neuer a word. But so soone as the allarom was given, the horsemen sodainly turned head vpon the PARTHIANS, and with great cries gaue charge on them: who at the first received their charge coragiously, for they were joined never the within an arrowes shoote. But when the legions also came to joine with them showing out allowde, & ratling of their armors: the PARTHIANS horses and them selves were so affrayed and amazed withall, that they all turned taile and fled, before the ROMANES could come to the sword with them. Then Antonius followed the hard in chase, being in great good hope by this conflict to have brought to end all, or the most part of this warre. But after that his footemen had chased them fiftie furlonges of, and the horsemen also thrise as farre: they found in all but thirty prisoners taken, and about foure score men only slaine. But this did D much discorage them, when they conidered with them selves, that obtaining the victory, they had flaine so few of their enemies: and where they were ouercome, they lost as many of their men, as they had done at the ouerthrow when the carriage was taken. The next morning, Antonius army truffed up their cariage, and marched backe towards their campe; and by the way in their returne they met at the first a sewe of the PARTHIANS ; then going further, they met a few moe. So at length when they all came together, they reuiled them, & troubled them on euery fide, as freshly & coragiously, as if they had not bene ouerthrowen: so that the Romans very hardly got to their campe with fafety. The MEDES on the other fide, that were befieged in their chiefe city of PHRAATA, made a fally out vpon them that kept the mount, which they had forced and cast against the wall of the city, and draue them for searc, from the mount they E men by ten legions, and then of them he put the tenth legion to death, on whom the lot fell: and to the other nine, he caused them to have barley given them in stead of wheate. Thus this warre fell out troublesome vnto both parties, and the ende thereof muche more fearefull. For Antonius could looke for no other of his side, but famine: bicause he could forrage no more, nor fetche in any vittells, without great loffe of his men. Phraortes on the other fide, he knew well enough that he could bring the PARTHIANS to anything els, but to lye in campe abroad in the winter. Therefore he was affrayed, that if the ROMANES continued their fiege all winter long,& made warre with him still:that his me would for sake him,& specially bicause the time

dines, for the which their king did esteeme them the more, and not without cause. After these spains the first baytes and allurements, they beganne by litle and litle to come neerer vnto them, and to talke with them a horsebacke, greatly blaming Antonius selsewill that did not gene their king Phraortes occasion to make a good peace, who desired nothing more, then to faue the lives of fo goodly a companie of valliant men: but that he was too fondly bent to abide two of the

B for the good hope he had of his returne: but yet he woulde not fende vnto the king of PAR-THIA, before they had first asked these barbarous people that spake so curteously voto his men. whether they spake it of them selues, or that they were their maisters words. When they told them the king him felfe fayd fo, and did perswade them further not to seare or mistrust them: then Antonius sent some of his frends vnto the king, to make demaund for the delivery of the enfignes and prisoners he had of the ROMANES, since the ouerthrow of Crassius: to the ende it should not appeare, that if he asked nothing, they shoulde thinke he were glad that he might only scape with safety out of the daunger he was in. The king of PARTHIA answered him: that for the enfignes & prisoners he demaunded, he should not breake his head about it; notwithftading, that if he would presently depart without delay, he might depart in peaceable maner,

C and without daunger. Wherefore Antonius after he had given his men some time to truffe vp their cariage, he raifed his campe, & tooke his way to depart. But though he had an excellent tongue at will, and very gallant to enterteine his fouldiers and men of warre, and that he could passingly well do it, as well, or better then any Captaine in his time: yet being ashamed for respects, he would not speake vnto them at his remouing, but willed Domitius A Enobarbus to do Ausnius 100 it. Many of them tooke this in very ill parte, & thought that he did it in disdaine of them : but sumeth from the most part of them presently understoode the truth of it, and were also ashamed. Therefore the temps of the Parthias.

did vnto them : and fo they became the more obedient vnto him. So Antonius was minded to returne the fame way he came, being a plaine barren contry without wodde. But there came a D fouldier to him, borne in the contry of the MARDIANS, who by oft frequenting the PARTHI-ANS of long time, knew their facions very wel, and had also shewed him selfe very true & faithfull to the ROMANES, in the battell where Antonius engines of battery and carriage were taken away. This man came vnto Antonius, to counfell him to beware how he went that way, and to make his army a pray, being heavily armed, vnto fo great a number of horsemen, all archers in the open field, where they should have nothing to let them to compasse him round about: and that this was Phraortes fetch to offer him fo frendly codicions & curteous words to make him raise his siege, that he might afterwards meete him as he would, in the plaines: how beit, that he would guide him, if he thought good, an other way on the right hand, through woddes & mountaines, a farre neerer way, and where he should finde great plenty of all things needefull E for his army Antonius hearing what he faid, called his counsel together, to consult vpon it. For after he had made peace with the PARTHIANS, he was loth to gene them cause to thinke he mistrusted them:and on thother side also he would gladly shorten his way, and passe by places wel inhabited, where he might be prouided of al things necessary: therfore he asked the MAR-DIAN what pledge he would put in, to performe that he promised. The MARDIAN gaue himself to be bound hand and foote, till he had brought his army into the contry of ARMENIA. So he guided the army thus bound, two dayes together, without any trouble or fight of enemy. But the third day, Antonius thinking the PARTHIANS would no more follow him, & trusting therin, fuffred the fouldiers to march in diforder as every ma lifted. The MARDIAN perceiving that the dammes of a river were newly broken vp, which they should have passed over, & that the F river had overflowen the bankes and drowned all the way they shoulde have gone: he geffed Straight that the PARTHIAN'S had done it, and had thus broken it open, to stay the ROMANES for getting too farre before them. Therupon he bad Antonius looke to him felfe, and told him 0000 iii

So after they had hurr many of the Romanes with their arrowes, and that they them selues were also hurt by them with their dartes and plummets of leade: they retyred a litle, and then came againe and gane charge. Vntill that the horsemen of the GAVLES turned their horses, & fiercely gallopped towards them, that they dispersed them so, as al that day they gathered no more together. Therby Antonius knew what to do, and did not only strengthen the rereward of his army, but both the flanks also, with darters and fling men, and made his army march in a square battell:commaunding the horsemen, that when the enemies should come to affaile them, they shoulde B drive them backe, but not follow them too farre. Thus the PART HIANS foure daies after, feeing they did no more hurte to the ROMANES, then they also received of them: they were not fo hotte vpon them as they were commaunded, but excusing them selues by the winter that troubled them, they determined to returne backe againe. And it is reported also, that Titim himselfe the Treasorer, tooke the enfignes, & did what he could to make the enfigne bearers returne backe, reuiling Flauius Gallus, bicause that through his folly and desperatnes he caused many honest and valliant men to be both hurt & flaine to no purpose. Gallus also fel out with him, and commaunded his men to flay. Wherefore Titius returned againe into the army, and Gallus stil ouerthrowing and driuing the enemies backe whom he met in the voward, he was not ware that he was compassed in. Then feeing him felfe enuironned of all fides, he fent vnto the army, that they should come Canidina and aide him: but there the Captaines that led the legions (among the which Canidaus, a man D fault, Antenius Capof great estimacion about Antonius made one) committed many faults. For in deede to fay truly, there was not at that time any Emperour or Captaine that had fo great & puisant an army as his together, both for lufty youths,& corage of the fouldiers, as also for their pacience to away with so great paines & trouble. Furreurence of thermore, the obedience & reuerece they shewed vnto their captaine, with a maruelous earnest loue & good wil, was so great: & all were indifferently (as wel great as smal, the noble ment as meane men, the Captaines and fouldiers) so earnestly bent to esteeme Antonius good will & fauor, aboue their owne life & fafety: that in this point of marshall discipline, the auncient Ro- # There and MANES could not have don any more. But divers things were cause therof, as we have told you before: Antonius nobility & ancient house, his eloquence, his plaine nature, his liberality & maenificence,

at that time to help, vifite, & lament those that were ficke & woulded, leing every man to have that which was meete for him: that was of fuch force & effect, as it made them that were ficke & wounded to loue him better, & were more desirous to do him seruice, then those that were whole & fould. This victory fo encoraged the enemies, (who otherwise were weary to follow Antonius any further) that all night longe they kept the fieldes, and houered about the Ro-MANES campe, thinking that they would presently flie, & then that they should take the spoile of their campe. So the next morning by breake of daye, there were gathered together a farre greater nuber of the PARTHIANS, then they were before. For the rumor was, that there were not much fewer then forty thowfand horse, bicause their king sent thither even the very gard

R about his person, as vnto a most certaine and assured victorie, that they might be partners of about his perion, as vinto a more certaine and anuted victories, that they high the fpoyle and booty they hoped to haue had: for as touching the king him felfe, he was neuer in any conflict or battell. Then Antonius desirous to speake to his souldiers, called for a uer came to blacke gowne, to appeare the more pitifull to them: but his friends did disswade him from it. fight in the Therefore he put on his coate armor, and being so apparelled, made an oration to his armie: in the which he highly commended them that had ouercome and driven backe their enemies, and greatly rebuked them that had cowardly turned their backes. of punishment it should please him to laye vpon them, so that he would forget any more to millike, or to be offended with them. Antonius seeing that, did lift vp his hands to heaven, and to come not to fight, but to spoyle and make hauock of all: when they came neare them, they were fore hurt with their flings and darts, and fuch other iauelings as the Romanes darted at

Then the ROMANES fodainely rose voon their feete, and with the darts that they threwe from them, they flue the formost, and put the rest to flight, and so did they the next dayes that followed. But by meanes of these daungers and lets, Antonius armie could winne no way in a day, by reason whereof they suffred great famine: for they had no instruments to grynd it, to make bread of it. For the most part of them had beneleft behind, bicause the beast's that caried them were either dead, or els imployed to cary them that were fore and wounded. For the famine was fo extreame great, that the eight parte of a in Antonius F bushell of wheate was sold for fifty Drachmas, and they sold barley bread by the waight of filuer. The PARTHIANS therfore feeing that three of the Romanes, and contrarily that they them selues were oftentymes put to flight, and welfauoredly beaten: they fell agains to their olde craftie futtelties. For when they found any of the Romanes scattered from the armieto goe forrage, to seeke some corne, or other vittells: they would come to them as if they had bene their friends, and shewed them their bowes vnbent, saying, that them selues also did returne home to their contry as they did, and that they would follow them no further, howbeir that they should yet have certaine MEDES that would follow them a dayes iorney or two to keepe them that they should doe no hurt to the villages from the high wayes: and so holding C them with this talke, they gently tooke their leave of them, and bad them farewell, so that the ROMANES began againe to thinke them selues safe. Antonius also vnderstanding this, being very glad of it, determined to take his way through the plaine contry, bicause also they should find no water in the mountaines, as it was reported vnto him. So as he was determined to take this course, there came into his hoast one Mithridates, a gentleman from the enemies campe, who was Cofen vnto Monezes that fled vnto Antonius, and vnto whome he had given three cities. When he came to Antonius campe, he praied them to bring him one that could speake the Parthian, or Syrian tongue. So one Alexander Antiochian, a famillier of Antonius, was brought vnto him. Then the gentleman told him what he was, and fayde, that Monezes had sent him to Antonius, to require the honor and curtesie he had shewed vnto him. After he D had vsed this ceremonious speeche, he asked Alexander if he sawe those highe Mountaines a farre of, which he poynted vnto him with his finger. Alexander aunswered he did. The PAR-THIANS (fayd he) doe lye in ambushe at the foote of those Mountaines, under the which ly eth a goodly playne champion contry: and they thinke that you beeing deceived with their craftie futtill wordes, will leave the way of the Mountaines, and turne into the plaine. For the other way, it is very hard and painefull, and you shall abide great thirst, the which you are well acquainted withall: but if Antonius take the lower way , let him affure him felfeto runne the fame fortune that Marcus Crassus did. So Mithridates having sayd, he departed. Antonius was maruelously troubled in his mind when he heard thus much, & therfore called for his friends, to heare what they would fay to it. The MARDIAN also that was their guide, being asked his E opinion, aunswered : that he thought as much as the gentleman Mithridates had sayd. For, fayd he, admit that there were no ambushe of enemies in the valley, yet is it a long crooked way, and ill to hit: where taking the Mountaine waye, though it be stonye and painefull, yet there is no other daunger, but a whole dayes trauelling without any water. So Antonius chauging his first mind and determination, removed that night, and tooke the Mountaine way, commaunding enery man to provide him felfe of water. But the most part of them lacking vessells to cary water in, some were driven to fill their falletts and murrians with water, and others also filled goates skinnes to cary water in. Nowe they marching forwarde, worde was brought vnto the PARTHIANS that they were remoued: whereuppon, contrary to their manner, they presently followed them the selfe same night, so that by breake of day they ouertooke the rereward of the ROMANES, who were so lame and wearied with going, and lacke of sleepe, that they were euen done. For, beyond expectacion, they had gone that night, two hundred

A and forty furlong, and further, to see their enemies so sodainly at their backs, that made them wherly dispaire: but moste of all, the fighting with them increased their thirst bicause they were forced to fight as they marched to drive their enemies backe, yet creeping on full. The woward of the armie by chaunce met with a river that was very cleere, and colde water, but it was falt and venemous to drinke: for straight it did gnawe the gutts of those that had dronke ittand made them maruelous drye, and put them into a terrible ache and pricking. And not withflanding that the MARDIAN had told them of it before yet they would not be ruled but sielently thrust them backe that would have kept them from drinking and so dranke? But Material going vo and downe among ft them, prayed them to take a little pacience for a while, for hard by there was another river that the water was excellent good to drinke. & that from & thereeforth the way was fo ftony and ill for horfemen, that the enemies could followe them no further. So he cansed the retreate to be sowned to call them backe that sought and com-manaded the tents to be fet uppe, that the fouldiers might yet have shadow to refresher here with So when the tents were let vp, and the PARTHIAN salforetyred according to their man-Her; the gentleman Mithridates before named, returned againe as before, and Mexanderin like manner againe brought ynto him for Interpreter. Then Mithridates aduited him sharestter the armie had reposed a litle, the Roman as should remove forthwith and with all possible freede get to the river: bicaule the PARTHIANS would goe no further, butyet were cruelly bent to follow them thither. Alexander caried the report thereof vnto Antonius, who gave him a great deale of gold plate to bestowe vpon Mithridates. Mithridates tooke as much of him as he could well cary away in his gowne, and so departed with speede. So Antonius rayled his Antonius campe being yet day light, and caused all his army to marche, & the PARTHIANS neuer trout- great librar bled any of them by the way: but amongest them selves it was as ill and dreadfull a night as e- thridate detier they had. For there were Villens of their owne company, who cut their fellowes throates the care he they carred: and at 1619gth, they let your september that state that dealed it among them felues. Amonitus fol-eariage, they brake goodly tables & riche plate in peeces, and deutided it among them felues. dies through Thereuppon all the campe was straight in tumult and vprore: For the residue of them were constanting. affraid it had beneathe PARTHIANS that had given them this alarom, and had put all the armie out of order, Infomuch that Antonius called for one Rhamnus, one of his flaves infranchifed that was of his gard, and made him give him his faith that he would thrust his sword through freez minde. him when he would bid him, and cut of his head: bicause he might not betaken aline of his enemies, nor knowen when he were dead. This grieued his friends to the hart, that they burft out a weeping for forrow. The MARDIAN also did comfort him, and assured him that the river he fought for was hard by and that he did geffe it by a fweete moyft wind that breathed voon them, and by the aver which they found fresher then they were wont, and also for that they fetched their wind more at libertie; and moreouer, bicaufe that fince they did fet forward, he thought they were neare their iorneys ende, not lacking much of day. On the other fide also,

Antonius was informed, that this great tumult and trouble came not through the enemies, but through the vile couetouines and villany of certaine of his fouldiers. Therefore Antonius R to let his armie againe in order, and to pacific this vprore, founded the trompet that every man should lodge. Now day began to breake, and the army to fall againe into good order, and all the hurly burly to cease, when the PARTHIAN'S drewe neare, and that their arrowes lighted among them of the rereward of his army. Thereuppon the fignall of battell was given to the light armed men, and the legioners did couer them selves as they had done before with their fhields with the which they received & defended the force of the PARTHIANS arrowes; who neuer durft any more come to hand ftrokes with them: and thus they that were in the voward, went downe by litle and litle, till at length they spyed the river. There Antonius placed his armed men you the fands to receive and drive backe the enemies, and first of alligot ouer his men that were ficke and hurt, and afterwards all the rest. And those also that were left

F to refift the enemies, had leyfure enough to drinke fafely, and at their pleafure. For when the PARTHIANS faw the river, they vinbent their bowes, and bad the Romanus paffe over without any feare, and greatly commended their valliantnes. When they had all paffed ouer the

for the money they had, and belides that, robbed the sumpters and carrage of such money as had of his fafthey carried: and at length, they fet upon Antonius flaues that draue his owne fumpters and The numb of river at their ease, they tooke a litle breath, and so marched forward againe, not greatly train. fting the PARTHIANS. The fixt daye after this last battell, they came to the river of Aranes. which deutdeth the contry of Armenia from Madia: the which appeared vnto them very daungerous to passe, for the depth and swiftnes of the streame. And surthermore, there range a rumor through the campe, that the PARTHIANS lay in ambushe thereabouts, and that they would come & fet your them whilest they were troubled in passing ouer the river. But now, after they were all comen fafely ouer without any daunger, and that they had gotten to the other fide, into the prouince of Armenia: then they worshipped that land, as if it had bene the first land they had seene after a long and daungerous voyage by sea, being now arrived in a safe and happy hauen: and the teares ranne downe their cheekes, and euery man imbraced eache other for the great joy they had . But nowe, keeping the fields in this frutefull contry for the plentifull of all things, after fo great a famine and want of all thinges: they fo crammed them felues with fuch plenty of vittells, that many of them were cast into flyxes and dropfics. There Antonius mustring his whole army, found that he had lost twenty thowsand footemen, and foure thowland horsemen, which had not all bene slavne by their enemies; for the most part of them dyed of ficknes, making feuen and twenty dayes iorney, comming from the citie of 18. fenerall PHRAATAINTO ARMENIA, and having overcome the PARTHIANS in eighteene severall batbattels fought tells, But these victories were not throughly performed nor accomplished, bicause they folwith the Pa lowed no long chase : and thereby it easily appeared, that Artabazus king of Armenia, had The mechany referred Antonius to end this warre, For if the fixteene thowfand horsemen which he brought with him out of MEDIA, had bene at these battells, considering that they were armed and apking of Arparelled much after the PARTHIANS manner, and acquainted also with their fight: When the ROMANES had put them to flight that fought a battell with them, & that their ARMENIANS had followed the chase of them that fled, they had not gathered them selues againe in force, neither durst they also have returned to fight with them so often, after they had bene so many times ouerthrowen. Therefore, all those that were of any credit and countenaunce in the army, did perswade and egge Antonius to be reuenged of this Armenian king. But Antonius wifely diffembling his anger, he told him not of his trechery, nor gaue him the worfe counter naunce, nor did him leffe honor then he did before : bicaufe he knew his armie was weake,& lacked things necessary. Howbeit afterwards he returned againe into Armenta with a great army, and lo with fayer wordes, and sweete promises of Messengers, he allured Artabazus to D. come vnto him : whome he then kept prisoner, and led in triumphe in the citie of ALEXAND DRIA. This greatly offended the ROMANES, and made them much to millike it: when they faw that for Cleopatraes fake he deprined his contry of her due honor and glory, onely to gratifie the ÆGYPTIANS. But this was a prety while after. Howbeit then, the great hafte he made to returne vnto Cleopatra, caused him to put his men to so great paines, forcing them to lyein. the field all winter long when it fnew vnreasonably, that by the way he lost eight thowsand of his men, and so came downe to the sea side with a small companye, to a certaine place called med and love love and forrow. So that he was at fuch a straight, that he wist not what to doe, and therefore

BLANCBOVEG, which standeth betwixt the cities of BERYTVS and SIDON, and there taried for Cleopatra. And bicause she taried longer then he would have had her, he pined away for to weare it out, he gaue him felfe to quaffing and feafting. But he was so drowned with the loue of her, that he could not abide to fit at the table till the feast were ended: but many times while others banketted, he ranne to the sea side to see if she were comming. At length she came, and brought with her a worlde of apparell and money to give vnto the fouldiers. But fome faye notwithstanding, that she brought apparell, but no money, and that she tooke of Antonius money, and caused it to be given amonge the fouldiers in her owne name, as if the had given it them. In the meane time it chaunced, that the king of the M EDES, and Phraortes king of the PARTHIANS, fell at great warrestogether, the which began (as it is reported) for the spoyles of the ROMANES: and grew to be so hot between them, that the king of MEDER. was no lesse affrayd, then also in daunger to lose his whole Realme. Thereuppon he sent ynto. Antonius to pray him to come and make warre with the PARTHIANS, promiting him that he would ayde him to his vetermost power. This put Antonius againe in good comfort, consider

Ling that valooked for the onely thing he lacked , (which made him he could not offercome the PARTHIANS, meaning that he had not brought horsemen, and men with darts and slings enough) was offred him in that fort: that he did him more pleasure to accept it, then it was pleasure to the other to offer it. Hereuppon, after he had spoken with the king of Manager theriuer of Araxes, he prepared him felte once more to goethrough ARMENIA, and to make more cruell warre with the PARTHIANS, then he had done before. Now whilest Antonius was busse in this preparation, Octauia his wife, whome he had left at Rome, would needes take sea to come vnto him. Her brother Octavius Cafar was willing vnto it, not for his respect at all (as most authors doe report) as for that he might have an honest culler to make warre with An-tonius if he did misule her, and not esteeme of her as she ought to be . But when she was come of sails, she R to A THENS, the received letters from Antonius, willing her to stay therewntill his comming, tonium wife, & did aduertise her of his iorney and determination. The which though it grieved her much, done to Aand that the knewe it was but an excuse: yet by her letters to him of aunswer, the asked him with bim, whether he would have those thinges sent vnto him which she had brought him, being great store of apparell for souldiers, a great number of horse, summe of money, and gifts, to bestow on his friendes and Captaines he had about him: and befides all those, the had two thowsand fouldiers chosen men, all well armed, like vnto the Prætors bands. When Niger, one of Antenius friends whome he had fent vnto ATHBNS, had brought these newes from his wife Octumia, and withall did greatly prayle her, as the was worthy, and well deferued: Cleopatra knowing that Octavia would have Antonius from her, and fearing also that if with her vertue and honest behauior, (besides the great power of her brother Casar) she did adde thereunto her modest kind loueto please her husband, that she would then be too stronge for her, and in the end winne him away: fhe futtelly seemed to languish for the love of Antonius, pyning her bo- Theflickering dy for lacke of meate. Furthermore, she euery way so framed her countenaunce, that when of Cheopara, Antonius came to fee her, the cast her eyes vpon him, like a woman rauished for ioy . Straight with Antonius againe when he went from her, the fell a weeping and blubbering, looked rufully of the marter, and still found the meanes that Antonius should oftentymes finde her weeping: and then when he came sodainely uppon her, she made as though she dryed her eyes, and turned her face away, as if the were viwilling that he should see her weepe. All these tricks the vied, Antonius being in readines to goe into Syria, to speake with the king of MEDES. Then the flatn terers that furthered Cleopatraes mind, blamed Antonius, and tolde him that he was a hard natured man, and that he had small loue in him, that would see a poore Ladye in such torment for his sake, whose life depended onely vpon him alone. For, Octavia, sayd they, that was maryedvnto him as it were of necessitie, bicause her brother Casars affayres so required it: hath the honor to be called Antonius lawefull spowse and wife: and Cleopatra, being borne a Queene of so many thowsands of men, is onely named Antonius Leman, and yet that she disdayned not so to be called, if it might please him the might enjoy his company, and line with him; but if he once leave her, that then it is vnpossible she should live. To be short, by the fe their flatteries and enticements, they so wrought Antonius effeminate mind, that fearing least she would make her felfe away: he returned againe vnto A LEXANDRI A, and referred the king of MEDES to the next yeare following, although he receyued newes that the PARTHIANS at that tyme were at civil warres amonge them selves. This notwithstanding, he went afterwardes and made peace with him. For he maried his Daughter which was very younge, vnto one of the The occasion fonnes that Cleopatra had by him: and then returned, beeingfully bent to make watre with being the Cafar. When Octavia was returned to Rome from ATHENS, Cafar commaunded her to goe tonium and out of Antonius house, and to dwell by her selfe, bicause he had abused her. Octavia aunswered cesarhim againe, that the would not for fake her husbands house, and that if he had no other occafron to make watre with him, the prayed him then to take no thought for her: for fayd the, it were too shamefull a thinge, that two so famous Captaines should bringe in civill warres among the Romanes, the one for the loue of a woma, &c the other for the icloufy betwixt one The loue of an other. Now as the spake the worde, so did the also performe the deede. For the kept still in Official to Antonius house, as if he had bene there, and very honestly and honorably kept his children, hubband, and not those onely she had by him, but the other which her husband had by Falsia. Further her wife and

more, when Antonius fent any of his men to Rome, to fue for any office in the comon wealth A the received him very curteoufly, and fo vsed her selfe vnto her brother, that she obtained the thing the requested. Howbeit thereby, thinking no hurt, the did Antonius great hurt. For her honest loue and regard to her husband, made every man hate him, when they sawe he did so vnkindly vse so noble a Lady: but yet the greatest cause of their malice vnto him, was for the diuision of lands he made amongst his children in the citie of ALEXANDRIA. And to confesse a troth, it was too arrogant and infolent a part, and done (as a man would fay) in derifion and contempt of the Romanes. For he affembled all the people in the show place, where younge men doe exercise them selues, and there vpon a high tribunal siluered, he set two chayres of gold, the one for him felfe, and the other for Cleopatra, and lower chaires for his children: then he openly published before the affembly, that first of all he did establish Cleopatra Queene of R premines yn. Egypt, of Cypavs, of Lydia, and of the lower Syria, and at that time also, Cafarion king of to his children the same Realmes. This Casarion was supposed to be the sonne of Iulius Casar, who had left Cleopatra great with child. Secondly he called the fonnes he had by her, the kings of kings, and gaue Alexander for his portion, ARMENIA, MEDIA, and PARTHIA, when he had conquered the contry: and vnto Ftolomy for his portion, PHENICIA, SYRIA, and CILICIA. And there-Alexander or withall he brought out Alexander in a long gowne after the facion of the MEDES, with a high Piolemy, An- copped tanke hat on his head, narrow in the toppe, as the kings of the Medes and Armenta ANS doe vice to weare them: and Ptolomy apparelled in a cloke after the MACEDONIAN manner, with flippers on his feete, and a broad hat, with a royall band or diademe. Such was the apparell and old attyre of the auncient kinges and fucceffors of Alexander the great. So after G his sonnes had done their humble duties, and kissed their father and mother: presently a company of ARMENIAN fouldiers fet there of purpose, compassed the one about, and a like company of the MACEDONIANS the other. Now for Cleopatra, the did not onely weare at that time (but at all other times els when the came abroad) the apparell of the goddeffe Isis, and to gaue audience vnto all her subiects, as a new Isis. Octavius Casar reporting all these thinges vnto the Senate, and oftentimes accusing him to the whole people and affembly in Rome: he thereby stirred vp all the ROMANES against him. Amonius on thother side sent to Rome likewise to accuse him, and the chiefest poyntes of his accusations he charged him with, were these. First, that having spoyled Sextus Pompeius in SICILE, he did not give him his parte of the Ile. Secondly, that he did deteyne in his hands the shippes he lent him to make that warre. Thirdly, D that having put Lepidus their companion and triumuirate out of his part of the Empire, and having deprived him of all honors: he retayned for him felfe the lands and revenues thereof, which had bene affigned vnto him for his part. And last of all, that he had in manner deuided all IT ALY amongest his owne fouldiers, and had left no part of it for his fouldiers. Off autus Cafar aunswered him againe: that for Lepidus, he had in deede deposed him, and taken his part of the Empire from him, bicause he did ouercruelly yse his authoritie. And secondly for the conquests he had made by force of armes, he was contented Antonius should have his part of them, so that he would likewise let him have his part of ARMENIA. And thirdly, that for his fouldiers, they should seeke for nothing in I TALY, bicause they possessed MEDIA and PAR-THIA, the which provinces they had added to the Empire of ROME, valliantly fighting with E their Emperor and Captaine. Antonius hearing these newes, being yet in Armenia, commaunded Canidius to goe prefently to the fea fide with his fixteene legions he had: and he him felfe with Cleopatra, went vnto the citie of EPHESVS, & there gathered together his gallies and shippes out of all parts, which came to the number of eight hundred; reckoning the great shippes of burden: and of those, Cleopatra furnished him with two hundred, and twenty thowsand talents besides, and prouision of vittells also to mainteyne al the whole army in this warre. So Antonius, through the perswasions of Domitius, commaunded Cleopatra to returne againe into ÆGYPT, and there to vnderstand the successe of this warre. But Cleopatra, searing least Antonius should againe be made friends with Octavius Cafar, by the meanes of his wife Octania: she so plyed Canidius with money, and filled his purse, that he became her spokes F man vnto Antonius, and told him there was no reason to send her from this warre, who defraied so great a charge: neither that it was for his profit, bicause that thereby the ÆGYPTIANS

A would then be veterly diffeoraged, which were the chiefeft frength of the army by feat confidering that he could fee no king of all the kings their confederats, that Gleapatra was inferior vnto, either for wifedom or judgement, feeing that longe before the had wifely governed for great a realme as Æ GYPT, & besides that she had bene so long acquainted with him, by whom the had learned to manedge great affayres. These fayer perswasions wan him: for it was predestined that the government of all the world should fall into Octavius Cafars handes. Thus, rich Cleans all their forces being joyned together, they hoyfed fayle towards the He of Samos, and there or with him. gaue them selues to feasts and sollace. For as all the kings, Princes, & communalties, peoples against the and cities from Syria, vnto the marishes Marotides, and from the Armania sand the Lindius celar

LYRIANS, were fent vnto, to fend and bringe all munition and warlike preparation they could: 6 kep great

B euen fo all players, minstrells, tumblers, sooles, and leasters, were commaunded to affemble in 18 of Semu the Ile of Samos, So that, where in manner all the world in every place was full of lamentati- seather. ons, fighes and teares: onely in this Ile of Samos there was nothing for many dayes space, but finging and pyping, and all the Theater full of these common players, minitrells, and singing men. Besides all this, enery citie sent an oxe thither to sacrifice, and kings did strine one with another who should make the noblest feasts, & give the richest gifts. So that every man fayd, what can they doe more for joy of victorie, if they winne the battell? When they make, already fuch fumptuous feafts at the beginning of the warre? When this was done, he gaue the whole rabble of these minstrells, & such kind of people, the citie of PRIENE to keepe them withal, during this warre. Then he went vnto the citie of ATHENS, and there gave him felfe ar gaine to fee playes and pastimes, and to keepe the Theaters. Cleopatra on the other side, being iclous of the honors which Octavia had received in this citie, where in deede the was marueloufly honored and beloued of the ATHENIANS: to winne the peoples good will allo at A-THENS, the gaue them great gifts: and they likewife gaue her many great honors, and appointed certain Ambassadors to cary the decree to her house, among the which Antonias was one. who as a Citizen of ATHENS reported the matter vnto her, & made an oration in the behalfe of the citie. Afterwards he fent to Rome to put his wife Octania out of his house, who (as it is his wife Octania reported) went out of his house with all Antonius children, saving the eldest of them he had by mia our of his Fuluia who was with her father, bewailing & lamenting her curied hap that had brought her boufe at Rome to this, that the was accompted one of the chiefest causes of this civill warre. The ROMANES

D did pitie her, but much more Antonius, & those specially that had seene Cleopatra: who nether excelled Octavia in beawtie, nor yet in young yeares. Octavius Cafar understanding the lodain & wonderful great preparation of Antonius, he was not a little aftonied at it. (fearing he thould be driven to fight that fommer) bicause he wanted many things, & the great and grietious exactions of money did forely oppresse the people. For all manner of men els, were driven to pay the fourth part of their goods and reuenue: but the Libertines, (to wete, those whose fathers or other predeceffors had some time bene bond men) they were seffed to pay, the eight part of all their goods at one payment. Hereuppon, there rofe a wonderfull exclamation and offmin tegreat vprore all ITALY ouer; fo that among the greatest faults that euer Antonius committed. far exacted they blamed him most, for that he delayed to give Casar battell. For he gave Casar leysure to ment of the E make his preparacions, and also to appeale the complaints of the people. When such a great Remanes. fumme of money was demaunded of them, they grudged at it, and growe to mutinie vpon it: but when they had once paied it, they remembred it no more. Furthermore, Titius and Plan-eus (two of Antonius chiefest friends and that had bene both of them Consuls) for the great iniuries Cleopatra did them, bicaule they hindered all they could, that the should not come to Plateas te this warre: they went and yelded them selues vnto Cafar, and tolde him where the teltament wolf from the was that Antonius had made, knowing perfitly what was in it. The will was in the cuffodie of sonius, and the Vestall Nunnes: of whom Cafar demaunded for it. They aunswered him, that they would dee reld to not give it him: but if he would goe and take it, they would not hinder him. Thereuppon Cafar went thither, & having red it first to him self, he noted certaine places worthy of reproch:

It is affembling all the Senate, he red it before them all. VV hereuppon divers were manuelously offended, and thought it a straunge matter that he being aliue, should be punished for that he had appoynted by his will to be done after his death. Cafar chiefly tooke hold of this that he

fent into ALEXANDRIA vnto Cleopatra, Furthermore, among divers other faultes wherewith Antonius was to be charged for Cleopatraes fake: Caluifus, one of Cafars friends reproued him. bicause he had franckly given Cleopatra all the libraries of the royall citie of Pergamy M. in the which the had aboue two hundred thow fand feueral bookes. Againe also, that being on a time fet at the table he fodainly rose from the borde, and trode vpon Cleopatraes foote, which was a figne given between them, that they were agreed of. That he had also suffred the Ephs SIANS in his presence to call Cleopatra, their souraine Ladye. That divers times sitting in his tribunall and chayer of state, giving audience to all kings and Princes: he had received lone letters from Cleopatra written in tables of onyx or christall, and that he had red them, firting & in his imperial feate. That one day when Furtime, a man of great accompt, and the eloquentel man of all the Romanes, pleaded a matter before him: Cleopatra by chaunce coming through the market place in her litter where Furnius was a pleading: Antonius straight rose out of his feare and left his audience to followe her litter. This notwithstanding, it was thought Caluifiat denifed the most part of all these accusations of his owne head. Neuertheles they that louted Unitonius, were interceffors to the people for him, and amongest thein they sent one Geminius vinto Antonius, to pray him he would take heede, that through his negligence his Empire were not taken from him, and that he should be counted an enemie to the people of ROME. This Geminius being arrived in GRECE, made Cleopatra iclous straight of his coming: bicaufe flie furmifed that he came not but to speake for Offauia. Therefore the spared not to O tawnt him all supper tyme, and moreouer to spyte him the more, she made him be set lowest of all at the borde, the which he tooke paciently, expecting occasion to speake with Antonius! Now Antonius commaunding him at the table to tell him what wind brought him thither:he aunfwered him that it was no table talke, and that he would tell him to morrow morning fafting: but dronke or fasting, how soener it were, he was sure of one thing, that all would not go well on his fide, vnles Cleopatra were fent backe into Æ GYPT. Antonius tooke these wordes in very ill part. Cleonatra on the other fide aunswered him, thou doest well Geminius, sayd she, to tell the truth before thou be compelled by torments: but within fewe dayes after, Geminius stale away, and fled to Rome. The flatterers also to please Cleopatra, did make her drive many Many of An other of Antonius faithfull feruaunts and friends from him, who could not abide the injuries D done vnto them : amonge the which these two were chiefe, Marcus Syllanus, and Dellius the Historiographer: who wrote that he fled, bicause her Phisitian Glaucus tolde him, that Cleopatra had fet some secretly to kill him. Furthermore he had Cleopatraes displeasure, bicause he fayde one night at fupper, that they made them drinke fower wine, where Sarmentus at ROME drancke good wine of FALERNA. This Sarmentus was a pleafaunt younge boye, fuch as the Lordes of Rome are wont to have about them to make them pastyme, which they call their ioyes, and he was Offsuius Cafars boye. Nowe, after Cafar had made sufficient preparation, he proclaymed open warre against Cleopatra, and made the people to abolishe the power and Empire of Antonius, bicaule he had before given it uppe vnto a woman. And Cafar fayde furthermore, that Antonias was not Maister of him felfe, but that Cleopatra had E brought him beside him selfe, by her charmes and amorous poysons: and that they that should make warre with them, should be Mardian the Euenuke, Photinus, and Iras, a woman of Cleopatraes bedchamber, that friseled her heare, and dressed her head, and Charmion, the which were those that ruled all the affaires of Antonius Empire. Before this warre, as it is reported, many fignes & wonders fel out. First of all, the citie of PISAVRVM which was made 2 colony to Rome, and replenished with people by Antonius, standing upon the shore side of the fea Adriatick, was by a terrible earthquake fonck into the ground. One of the images of stone which was fet up in the honor of Antonius, in the citie of Alba, did sweate many dayes together Pelaro, a citie ther: and though some wyped it away, yet it left not sweating still. In the citie of PATRAS, in Italy fonch whilest Antonius was there, the temple of Hercules was burnt with lightning. And at the citie ! of ATHENS also, in a place where the warre of the gyants against the goddes is set out in imagerie: the statue of Bacebus with a terrible winde was throwen downe in the Theater.

A It was fayd that Antonius came of the race of Hercules, as you have heard before, and in the manner of his life he followed Bacchus: and therefore he was called the new Bacchus. Furthermore, the same bluftering storme of wind, overthrew the great most rous images at ATHENS. that were made in the honor of Eumenes and Attalus, the which men had named and intituled. the Antonians, and yet they did hurt none of the other images which were many befides. The Admirall galley of Cleopatra, was called Antoniade, in the which there chanced a marnelous frequently for Small and band and and an antiill figne. Swallowes had bred under the poope of her shippe, & there came others after them swallowers that draue away the first, & plucked downe their neasts. Now when all things were ready, and day in the that they drew neare to fight: it was found that Antonius had no leffe then five hundred good page to be thips of warre, among the which there were many gallies that had eight & ren bancks of own

B ers, the which were sumptuously furnished, not so meete for fight, as for triumpher a bundlest thowland footenen, & twelue thowland horsemen, & had with him to ayde him these kinges and fubicets following. Bocchus king of LyBIA, Tarcondemus king of high Cilicia, Anchelant Talking king of CAPPADOCIA, Philadelphus king of PAPHLAGONIA, Mithridates king of Comments and Adallas king of THRACIA. All the which were there every man in person. Therefiducations were absent sent their armies, as Polemo king of Pont, Manchus king of ARABIA, Herodes king of Ivry: & furthermore, Amyntasking of Lycaonia, & of the Galatians: and befides all these, he had all the ayde the king of M B D B s sent vnto him. Now for Casar, he had two him. dred and fifty shippes of warre, foure score thowsand sootemen, & well neare as many horse- usus cefer amen as his enemy Antonius, Antonius for his part, had all under his dominio from Antonius, gaing Anto-C & the river of Euphrates, vnto the lea Ioniv m & Illy Ricv m. Octanius Cafar had allo for his, Anonim de part, all that which was in our Hemisphære, or halfe part of the world, from I LE YRIANOE minion. the Occean sea vponthe west: then all from the Occean, vnto Mare Signific & from Agazon, of mine Ca all that which is against ITALY, as GAVLE, & SPAYNE. Furthermore, all from the prounce of fare dominion. CYRENIA, VIIO ÆTHIO PIA, Was subiect vinto Antonius. Now Antonius was made lo subiect to Anonius was a womans will, that though he was a great deale the stronger by land, yet for Cleopatrate fake, main ruled he would needes have this battell tryed by fea: though he fawe before his eyes, that for lacke b clepan of water men, his Captaines did presse by force all forces of men out of Gazea that they could take vp in the field, as trauellers, muletters, reapers, haruest men, and younge boyes, and yet could they not sufficiently surnishe his gallies: so that the most part of them were emp-D ty, and could fcant rowe, bicaufe they lacked water men enowe. But on the contrary fide 64-fars shippes were not built for pompe, highe, and great, onely for a fight and brauery, but there were light of yarage armed and furnished with water men as many as they needed, and had them all in readines, in the hauens of TARENTY M, and BRYNDYSIYM. So Offanius Cefar Lent vnto Antonius, to will him to delay no more time, but to come on with his army into I TALLY. and that for his owne part he would give him fafe harber, to lande withou any trouble, and that he would withdraw his armie from the sea, as farre as one horse could runne, you he had, put his army a shore, & had lodged his men. Antonius on the other side brauely sent him word againe, and chalenged the combate of him man to man, though he were the elder, and that if he refused him so, he would then fight a battell with him in the fields of PHARSALIAS AS LIVERS E Cafar, and Pompey had done before. Now whilest Antonius rode at anker, lying idely in harben Antonius at the head of Activm, in the place where the citie of Nicopolis standeth at this prefere at the head of Cafar had quickly passed the sea Ionium, and taken a place called Tony NE, before Antonius, Attitumbers understoode that he had taken shippe. Then began his men to be affraid, bicause his array by the citie of land was left behind, but Cicopatra making light of it; and what daming the property of the parcel Cefar keepe at * Toryne? The next morning by breake of day, his enemies comming with. The grace of the land can be supported by the land can be suppo full force of owers in battell against him, Antonius was affraid that if they came to joynes they may proprie would take and cary away his shippes that had nomen of warre in them. So he armed all his, be expected water men, and fet them in order of battell vpon the forecastell of their shippes, and then life in any other vp all hisrancks of owers towards the element, as well of the one fide, as the other, with the coule of the E proces against the enemies, at the entry and mouth of the gulfe, which beginneth at the point equipocation of Active, and so kept them in order of battell, as if they had bene armed and furnished with of the word water men and fouldiers. ANTONIVS. tyred presently, and therewithall Antonius very wifely and sodainely did cut him of from fresh A water. For vnderstanding that the places where Octanius Cafar landed, had very litle store of water, and yet very bad : he shut them in with stronge ditches and trenches he cast, to keepe them from falying out at their pleasure, and so to goe seeke water further of. Furthermore, he delt very friendely and curreoully with Domitius, and against Cleopatraes mynde. For he being sicke of an agewe when he went and tooke a litle boate to goe to Casars campe, Antonims was very fory for it, but yet he fent after him all his caryage, trayne, and men: and the same Domition, as though he gaue him to vinderstand that he repented his open treason, he died immediatly after. There were certen kings also that for sooke him, and turned on Casars fide: as Amyness, and Deiotarus. Furthermore, his fleete and nauv that was vnfortunate in all thinges, and vnready for feruice, compelled him to chaunge his minde, and to hazard battell by land. R And Canidius also, who had charge of his army by land, when time came to follow Antonius determination: he turned him cleane contrary, and counfelled him to fend Cleopatra backe againe, and him felfe to retyre into MACEDON, to fight there on the maine land. And furthermore told him, that Dicomes king of the GETES, promifed him to ayde him with a great power: and that it should be not shame nor dishonor to him to let Cafar have the sea, (bicause him selfe & his men both had bene well practifed & exercised in battels by sea, in the warre of Si-CILIA against Sextus Pompeius) but rather that he should doe against all reason, he having so great skill and experience of battells by land as he had, if he should not employ the force and valliantnes of fo many lufty armed footemen as he had ready, but would weaken his army by deniding them into thippes. But now, notwithstanding all these good perswasions, Cleopatra C. forced him to put all to the hazard of battel by sea: considering with her selse how she might flie, & prouide for her fafetie, not to helpe him to winne the victory, but to flie more eafily after the battel lost. Betwixt Antonius campe & his fleete of shippes, there was a great hie point of firme lande that ranne a good wave into the fea, the which Antonius often vied for a walke, without miltrust of feare or daunger. One of Cafars men perceived it, & told his Maister that he would laugh & they could take vp Antonius in the middest of his walke. Thereuppon Cafar fent some of his men to lye in ambush for him, & they missed not much of taking of him; for they tooke him that came before him, bicause they discouered to soone, & so Antonius scaped verie hardly. So when Antonius had determined to fight by fea, he fet all the other shippes a fire, but three score shippes of ÆGYPT, & reserved onely but the best & greatest gallies, from D three bancks, vnto tenne bancks of owers. Into them he put two & twenty thow and fighting men with two thowfand darters & flingers. Now, as he was fetting his men in order of battel, there was a Captaine, & a valliant man, that had serued Antonius in many battels & conflicts, & had all his body hacked & cut: who as Antonius paffed by him, cryed out vnto him, & fayd: O noble Emperor, how commeth it to paffe that you trust to these vile brittle shippes? what, doe you mistrust these woundes of myne, and this sword? let the ÆGYPTIANS & PHENICI-ANS fight by sea, and set vs on the maine land, where we vie to conquer, or to be slayne on our feete. Antonius passed by him, and fayd neuer a word, but only beckoned to him with his hand & head, as though he willed him to be of good corage, although in deede he had no great corage him selfe. For when the Masters of the gallies & Pilots would have let their failes alone, R he made them clap them on, faying to culler the matter withall, that not one of his enemies should scape. All that day, & the three dayes following, the sea rose so high, & was so boysterous, that the battel was put of. The fift day the storme ceased, & the sea calmed againe, & the they rowed with force of owers in battaile one against the other: Antonius leading the right wing with Publicola, & Calius the left, & Marcus Oftanius, & Marcus Iusteius the middelt. Oftawine Cafar on thother fide, had placed Agrippa in the left winge of his armye, and had kept the rightwinge for him selfe. For the armies by lande, Canidius was generall of Antonius side, and Taurus of Casars side: who kept their men in battell raye the one before the other, vppon the fea fide, without stirring one agaynst the other. Further, touching both the Chieftaynes: Antonius being in a swift pinnase, was caried up and downe by force of owers through his army, & spake to his people to encorage them to fight valliantly, as if they were on maine land, bicause of the steadines & heavines of their ships: & commaunded the Pilots & masters of the 1001 A gallies, that they should not sturre, none otherwise then if they were at anker, and so to teceiue the first charge of their enemies, and that they should not goe out of the straight of the gulfe. Cafar betyines in the morning going out of his tent, to fee his thips thorough out met a man by chaunce that draue an affe before him. Cafar asked the man what his name was. The wate of the poore man told him, his name was Eutychus, to fay, fortunate: and his affes name Nicon, to us Cafer. fay, Conquerer. Therefore Cafar after he had wonne the battell, fetting out the market place Englishmen with the sources of the gallies he had taken, for a signe of his victorie; he caused also the man commune.

and his affe to be fet up in braffe. When he had vilited the order of his armie thorough out. he tooke a little pinnafe, and went to the right wing, and wondered when he sawe his enemies lve stil in the straight, & sturred not. For, decerning them a farre of, men would have thought

B they had bene shippes riding at anker, and a good while he was so perswaded: So he kept his gallies eight furlong from his enemies. About noone there role a litle gale of winde from the lea, and then Antonius men waxing angry with tarying lo long, and trusting to the greatnes. and height of their shipps, as if they had bene inuincible: they began to march forward with their left wing. Cafar feeing that, was a glad man, and began a litle to give backe from the fight wing to allure them to come further out of the straight & gulfe: to thend that he might with his light thippes well manned with water men, turne and enuirone the gallies of the engines. the which were heavy of yarage, both for their biggenes, as also for lacke of watermen to row them. When the skirmith began, and that they came to joyne, there was no greathurt at the first meeting, neither did the shippes vehemently hit one against the other, as they does come C monly in fight by sea. For on the one side, Antonius shippes for their heavines, could not have the strength and swiftnes to make their blowes of any force: and Cafare shippes on thother fide tooke great heede, not to rushe & shockewith the forecastells of Antonius (hippes, whole proues were armed with great brasen spurres. Furthermore they durst not flancke them bicause their points were easily broken, which way socuer they came to fet upon his shippes. that were made of great mayne square peeces of tymber, bounde together with great iron pinnes: fo that the battel was much like to a battel by land, or to speake more properly, to the affault of a citie. For there were alwaies three or foure of Cafars thippes about one of Antonis m (hippes, and the fouldiers fought with their pykes, halberds, and darrs, and threw pots and darts with fire. Antonius ships on the other side bestowed among them, with their crosbowes D and engines of battery, great store of shot from their highe towers of wodde, that were apon their thippes. Now Publicola feing Agrippa put forth his left wing of Cafars army, to compasse in Antonius shippes that fought: he was driven also to loofe of to have more roome, & going a litle at one fide, to put those further of that were affraid, and in the middest of the battel. For they were fore distressed by Aruntius. Howbeit the battell was yet of euen hand, and the victorie doubtfull, being indifferent to both: when fodainely they faw the three fcore shippes of Cleopatra bufic about their yard masts, and hoyfing faile to flie. So they fled through the mid- cleopatra fre dest of them that were in fight, for they had bene placed behind the great shippes, & did mar. uelously disorder the other shippes. For the enemies them selues wondred much to see them faile in that fort, with ful faile towards PELOPONNES VS. There Antonius thewed plainely, that E he had not onely lost the corage and hart of an Emperor, but also of a valliant man, & that he was not his owne man : (prouing that true which an old man spake in myrth that the soule of The fault of a a louer lived in another body, and not in his owne) he was so caried away with the vaine loue in another member of this woman, as if he had bene glued vnto her, & that the could not have removed without body. mouing of him alfo. For when he faw Cleopatraes shippe vnder faile, he forgot, for fooke, & be Antonius fly traved them that fought for him, & imbarked vpon a galley with fine bankes of owers, to fold opena, low her that had already begon to ouerthrow him, & would in the end be his ytter destruction. When the knew this galley a farre of the lift up a figne in the poope of her thippe, and to Antonius comming to it, was pluckt vp where Cleopatra was, how beit he faw her not at his first comming, nor she him, but went and sate down alone in the prowe of his shippe, and said ne-

Fuer a word, clapping his head between both his hands. In the meane time came certaine light brigantynes of Cafars that followed him hard. So Antonius straight turned the prowe of his thippe, and presently put the rest to flight, saving one Eurysles LACED & MONIAN, that follow-stell of his ship, & asked him whathe was that durst follow Antonius so neare? I am aunswered he Eurycles the fonne of Luchares, who through Cafars good fortune seketh to reuenge the death of my father. This Lachares was condemned of fellonie, and beheaded by Antonius. But vet Eurycles durst not venter on Antonius (hippe, but fet voon the other Admirall galley (for there were two) and fell with him with fuch a blowe of his brasen spurre, that was so heavy and bigge, that he turned her round, and tooke her, with another that was loden with very rich stuffe and cariage. After Eurycles had left Antonius, he returned againe to his place and fate downe, foeaking neuer a word as he did before: and fo lived three dayes alone, without speaking to any man. But when he arrived at the head of Tænarus, there Cleopatraes women h first brought Amonius and Cleopatra to speake together, and afterwards, to suppe and letogether. Then beganne there agayne a great number of Marchaunts shippes to gather about cencesh bie friends to depars, and giuesh them a them land fome of their friends that had escaped from this ouerthrow: who brought newes. that his army by fea was ouerthrowen but that they thought the army by land was yet whole. The Anemia lent vinto Canidius, to returne with his army into Asia, by Maced on Now for him felf, he determined to croffe ouer into A FRICK, & toke one of his carects or hulks loden with gold and filtuer, and other rich carriage, and gaue it vnto his friends: commaunding them to depart, and to feeke to faue them felues. They aunswered him weeping, that they would nether doe it, nor yet for fake him . Then Antonius very curteously and louingly did comfort them and prayed them to depart: and wrote vnto Theophilus gouernor of CORINTHE, that C Shippe loden he would fee them fafe, and helpe to hide them in some lecret place, until they had made their with gold and way and peace with Cafar. This Theophilus was the father of Hipparchus, who was had in great estimation about Antonius. He was the first of all his infranchised bondmen that revolted from him, and yelded vnto Cafar, and afterwardes went and dweltat CORINTHE. And thus it floode with Antonius. Now for his armie by fea, that fought before the head or foreland of ACTIVM: they helde out a longe tyme, and nothing troubled them more then a great boyfterous wind that rose full in the prooes of their shippes, and yet with much a doe, his nauy was at length ouerthrowen five howers within night. There were not flaine about five thowfand men: but yet there were three hundred shippes taken, as Octavius Casar writeth him on by Cefar. felfe in his commentaries. Many plainely fawe Antonius flie, and yet could hardly beleeue D it, that he that had nyneteene legions whole by lande, and twelue thowfand horsemen vpon the fea side, would so have for saken them, and have fled so cowardly: as if he had not oftentimes proued both the one and the other fortune, & that he had not bene throughly acquainted with the divers chaunges and fortunes of battells. And yet his fouldiers full withed for him, and euer hoped that he would come by some meanes or other vnto them. Furthermore, they shewed them selves so valliant and faithfull vnto him, that after they certainly knewe he was fled, they kept them selues whole together seuen daies. In the ende Canidius, Antonius Lieuetenant, flying by night, and forfaking his campe: when they faw them felues thus deftitute of their heads and leaders, they yelded themselves vnto the stronger. This done, Cafar failed towards Athens, and there made peace with the Grecians, and deuided the rest of the B come that was taken up for Antonius army, unto the townes and cities of GRECE, the which had bene brought to extreme mifery & pouerty, cleane without money, flaues, horfe, & other beaftes of cariage. So that my grandfather Nicarchus tolde, that all the Citizens of our citie of CHERONEA, (not one excepted) were driven them selves to cary a certaine measure of corne on their shoulders to the sea side, that lieth directly ouer against the Ile of Anticyra, & yet were they driven thether with whippes. They caried it thus but once: for, the fecond tyme that they were charged agains to make the like carriage, all the corne being ready to be carried, newes came that Antonius had loft the battel, & fo scaped our poore city. For Antonius souldiers & deputies fled immediatly, & the citizens deuided the corne amongst them. Antonius be-

he him felfe remained very folitary, having onely two of his friends with him, with whom he wandred up & down, both of them orators, the one Ariftocrates a GRECIAN, & the other Lu-

A cilius a Romane. Of whom we have written in an other place, that at the hattell where Bruthe Livillius field was ouerthrowen, by the citie of PHILIPPES, he came & willingly put him fell into the hands of in braining of those that followed Brutus, saying that it was he: bicause Brutus in the meane time might haue liberty to faue him selse. And afterwards bicause Antonius saued his life, he still remained The sidelinia with him : and was very faithfull and frendly vnto him till his death. But when Antonine heard, of Lucibus that he whom he had trusted with the gouernment of LIBYA, and vnto whom he had genen nine. the charge of his armie there, had yelded vnto Cafar: he was so madde withall, that he would haue flaine him felfe for anger, had not his frendes about him withstoode him, and kept him from it. So he went vnto ALEX AND RIA, and there found Cleopatra about a wonderfull enter- The wonderprife, and of great attempt. Betwixt the redde fea, and the fea betwene the landes that poynt ful attempt of B vpon the coast of ÆGYPT, there is a litle peece of land that deuideth both the seas and separateth Africks from Asia: the which straight is so narrow at the end where the two seasare narrowest, that it is not about three hundred furlonges ouer. Cleopatra went about to lift her shippes out of the one sea, and to hale them ouer the straight into the other sea: that when her shippes were come into this goulfe of ARABIA, she might then carie all her gold & silver away, and so with a great companie of men goe and dwell in some place about the Ocean sea farre from the sea Mediterranium, to scape the daunger and bondage of this warre. But now, bicause the Arabians dwelling about the citie of Petra, did burne the first shippes that were brought alande, and that Antonius thought that his armie by lande, which heleft at A-CTIVM was yet whole: the left of her enterprife, and determined to keepe all the portes and c passages of her realme. Antonius, he for sooke the citie and companie of his frendes, and built Antonius falhim a house in the sea, by the He of Pharos, vpon certaine forced mountes which he caused loweth the title to be cast into the sea, and dwelt there, as a man that banished him selfe from all mens companie: faying that he would lead Timons life, bicaufe he had the like wrong offered him, that fauthropus was affore offered vnto Timon: and that for the vnthankefulnes of those he had done good vn- the Athenian. to, and whom he tooke to be his frendes, he was angry with all men, and would trust no man. This Timon was a citizen of ATHENS, that lived about the warre of PELOPONNESVS, as appeareth by Plato, and Ariftophanes commedies: in the which they macked him, calling him a Plato, & Avyper, & malicious man vnto mankind, to thunne all other mens companies, but the compariftophanes tellimient of nie of young Alcibiades, a bolde and infolent youth, whom he woulde greatly feaft, and make Timon D much of, and kiffed him very gladly. Apemantus wondering at it, asked him the cause what he Misanthas ment to make fo muche of that young man alone, and to hate all others: Timon aunswered was. him, I do it fayd he, bicause I know that one day he shall do great mischiefe vnto the ATHE NIANS, This Timon sometimes would have Apemantus in his companie, bicause he was much like to his nature & condicions, and also followed him in maner of life. On a time when they folemnly celebrated the feasts called Choæ at Athens, (to wit, the feasts of the dead, where they make sprincklings and sacrifices for the dead) and that they two then seasted together by them felues, Apemantus faid vnto the other: O, here is a trimme banket Timon, Timon aunfivetime (the people being affembled in the market place about dispatch of some affaires) got vp filence being made, euerie man liftning to heare what he would fay, bicause it was a wonder to fee him in that place: at length he began to speake in this maner. My Lordes of ATHENS.

Passe by, and curse thy fill: but passe, and stay not here thy gate. Many other things could we tell you of this Timon, but this litle shall suffice at this present But now to returne to Antonius againe, Canidius him felfe came to bring him newes, that he had loft all his armie by land at Acrivm. On thother fide he was advertised also, that Herodes king of IvRIE, who had also certeine legions and bandes with him, was revolted vnto Cafar. and all the other kings in like maner: fo that, fauing those that were about him, he had none lest him. All this notwithstanding did nothing trouble him, and it seemed that he was contented to forgoe all his hope, and so to be ridde of all his care and troubles. Thereupon he left his folitarie house he had built in the sea which he called Timoneon, and Cleopatra received B Antonism rio- him into her royall pallace. He was no fooner comen thither, but he straight fet all the city of rioting and banketing againe, and him felfe, to liberalitie and giftes. He caused the sonne of bingest life Iulius Cafar and Cleopatra, to be enrolled (according to the maner of the Romans) amongest courthron. the number of young men: & gaue Antyllus, his eldeft fonne he had by Fuluia, the mans gowne. the which was a plaine gowne, without gard or imbroderie of purple. Amenius and This notwithstanding, they sent Ambassadors vnto Octavius Cafar in Asia, Cleopatra requefling the realme of AGYPT for her children, and Antonius praying that he might be fuffered to liue at Athens like a private man, if Cafar would not let him remaine in Æ G YPT. And bi-Offering Ce- cause they had no other men of estimacion about them, for that some were stedde, and those that remained, they did not greatly trust them: they were inforced to sende Euphronius the E schoolemaister of their children. For Alexas L ADDICIAN, who was brought into Antonius house and fauor by meanes of Timagenes, and afterwards was in greater credit with him, then any other GRBCIAN: (for that he had alway bene one of Cleopatraes ministers to win Antonius, and to overthrow all his good determinations to vie his wife Octavia well) him Antonius had fent vnto Herodes king of Ivare, hoping still to keepe him his frend, that he should not revolt from him. But he remained there, and betrayed Antonius. For where he should have kept Herodes from revolting from him, he perswaded him to turne to Cafar. & trusting king Herodes, he prefumed to come in Cafars prefence. Howbeit Herodes did him no pleafure: for he was prefently taken prisoner, and sent in chaines to his owne contrie, & there by Casars commaundement put to death. Thus was Alexas in Antonius life time put to death, for betraying of him. Furthermore, Cafar would not graunt vnto Antonius requests: but for Cleopatra, he made her aunswere, that he woulde deny her nothing reasonable, so that she would either put Antonius to death, or drive him out of her contrie. Therewithall he fent Thyrew one of his men vnto her, a verie wife and discreete man, who bringing letters of credit from a young Lorde vnto a noble Ladie, and that besides greatly liked her beawtie, might easely by his eloquence haue perswaded her. He was longer in talke with her then any man else was, and the Queene her felfe also did him great honor: infomuch as he made Antonius gealous of him. Whereupon Antonius caused him to be taken and well fanoredly whipped, and so sent him vnto Cafar : and had him tell him that he made him angrie with him bicause he shewed him selfe prowde and dildainfull towards him, and now specially when he was easie to be angered, by reason of his present miserie. To be short, if this mislike thee said he, thou hast Hipparchus one of my infrairchiled bondmen with thee: hang him if thou wilt, or whippe him at thy pleafure, that we may B crie quittaunce. From thenceforth, Cleopatra to cleere her leffe of the justicion he had of her. the made more of him then ever the did. For first of all, where the did folemnise the day of her birth very meanely and sparingly, fit for her present misfortune: the now in contrary maner did keepe it with such solemnitie, that she exceeded all measure of sumpty outnes and magnificence: fo that the ghests that were bidden to the seasts, and came poore, went away rich.

Nowe things passing thus, Agrippa by divers letters sent one after an other ynto Calar, praved him to returne to Rome, bicause the affaires there did of necessity require his person and prefence. Thereupon he did deferre the warre till the next yeare following: but when winter was done, he returned again through Syria by the coast of Africke, to make warres against Antonius, and his other Captaines. When the citie of Parvsiv was taken, there ran a ru- Pelufaum val e mor in the citie, that Seleucus, by Cleopatraes confent, had furrendered the fame. Butto cleere 10 Octavinus her felfe that the did not, Cleopatra brought Seleucus wife and children vnto Antonius, to be re- cafe. uenged of them at his pleafure. Furthermore, Cleopatra had long before made many fumptu-ous tombes and monumentes, as well for excellencie of workemanshippe, as for height and greatnes of building, joyning hard to the temple of Ilis. Thither the caused to be brought all cleopartes the treasure & pretious things she had of the auncient kings her predecessors: as gold, silver, manufactures emerods, pearles, ebbanie, iuorie, and finnamon, and besides all that, a maruelous number sample of siste of torches, faggots, and flaxe. So Ottavius Cafar being affrayed to loofe fuche a treasure and maffe of riches, and that this woman for spight would fet it a fire, and burne it every whit: he alwayes fent fome one or other vnto her from him, to put her in good comfort, whileft he in D the meane time drewe necre the citie with his armie. So Cafar came, and pitched his campe hard by the city, in the place where they runne and manage their horses. Antonius made a fally vpon him, and fought verie valliantly, to that he draue Cafars horsemen backe, fighting with his men eyen into their campe. Then he came againe to the pallace, greatly boatting of this victorie, and sweetely kissed Cleopatra, armed as he was, when he came from the fight, recommending one of his men of armes vnto her, that had valliantly fought in this skirmish. Cleapatra to reward his manlines, gaue him an armor and head peece of cleane gold: how beit the man at armes when he had received this rich gift, stale away by night, and went to Cafar. And tonius sent againe to chalenge Cafar, to fight with him hande to hande. Cafar aunswered him, that he had many other wayes to dye then fo. Then Antonius feeing there was no way more p honorable for him to dye, then fighting valliantly: he determined to fette vp his reft, both by fea and lande. So being at fupper, (as it is reported) he commaunded his officers and household feruauntes that waited on him at his bord, that they should fill his cuppes full, and make as muche of him as they could: for faid he, you know not whether you shall doe so much for me to morrow or not, or whether you shall ferue an other maister; and it may be you shall fee me no more, but a dead bodie. This notwithstanding, perceiving that his frends and men fell aweeping to heare him fay fo: to falue that he had spoken, he added this more vnto it, that he would not leade them to battell, where he thought not rather fafely to returne with victorie. then valliantly to dye with honor. Furthermore, the felfe fame night within litle of midnight, when all the citie was quiet, full of feare, and forrowe, thinking what would be the iffue and Pende of this warre: it is faid that fodainly they heard a maruelous fweete harmonie of fundrie Smange thought that it was the god vnto whom Antonius bare fingular denotion to counterfeate and toward the citie. When Antonius fawe that his men did forfake him, and yeelded vnto Cafar, B and that his footemen were broken and ouerthrowen : he then fled into the citie, crying out that Cleopatra had betrayed him vnto them, with whom he had made warre for her fake. Then the being affraied of his fury, fled into the tombe which the had caused to be made, and there locked the dores vnto her, and thut all the springes of the lockes with great boltes, and in the meane time fent vnto Antonius to tell him that the was dead. Antonius beleuing it, faid vnto sombe er mo- him selfe: what doest thou looke for further, Antonius, sith spitefull fortune hath taken from thee the only joy thou haddest, for whom thou yet reserved thy life? when he had sayd these words, he went into a chamber & vnarmed him felfe, and being naked faid thus: O Cleopatrajt. grieueth me not that I have lost thy companie, for I will not be long from thee: but I am fory, that having bene so great a Captaine and Emperour, I am in deede condemned to be judged C of leffe corage and noble minde, then a woman. Now he had a man of his called Eros, whom he loued and trusted much, and whom he had long before caused to sweare vnto him, that he should kill him when he did commaunde him: and then he willed him to keepe his promise, His man drawing his fworde, lift it vp as though he had ment to haue striken his maister: but turning his head at one fide, he thrust his sword into him selfe, and fell downe dead at his maifters foote. Then faid Antonius, O noble Eros, I thanke thee for this, and it is valliantly done of thee, to shew me what I should doe to my selfe, which thou couldest not doe for me. Therewithall he tooke his fword, and thrust it into his bellie, and so fell downe your a litle bed. The wounde he had killed him not presently, for the blood stinted a litle when he was layed: and when he came somwhat to him selfe againe, he praied them that were about him to dispatch D him, But they all fled out of the chamber, and left him crying out & tormenting him felfeivntill at last there came a secretarie vnto him called Diomedes, who was commaunded to bring him into the tombe or monument where Cleopatra was. When he heard that she was aliue, he verie earnestlie prayed his men to carie his bodie thither, and so he was caried in his mens armes into the entry of the monument. Notwithstading, Cleopatra would not open the gates, but came to the high windowes, and cast out certaine chaines and ropes, in the which Antonius was truffed; and Cleopatra her owne felfe, with two women only, which she had suffered Alamentable to come with her into these monumentes, trised Antonius vp. They that were present to behold it, faid they neuer faw fo pitiefull a fight. For, they plucked up poore Antonius all bloody as he was, and drawing on with pangs of death, who holding up his hands to Cleopatra, railed E vp him felfe as well as he could. It was a hard thing for these women to do, to lift him vp : but Cleopatra stowping downe with her head, putting to all her strength to her vittermost power, did lift him vp with much a doe, and neuer let goe her hold, with the helpe of the women beneath that bad her be of good corage, and were as forie to fee her labor fo, as she her selfe. So when she had gotten him in after that forte, and layed him on a bed: she rent her garments vpon him, clapping her breft, and fcratching her face & ftomake. Then the dried vp his blood that had berayed his face, and called him her Lord, her husband, and Emperour, forgetting her owne miferie and calamity, for the pitie and compassion she tooke of him. Antonius made her ceasile her lamenting, and called for wine, either bicause he was a thirst, or else for that he thought thereby to hasten his death. When he had dronke, he earnestly prayed her, and perfwaded her, that the would feeke to faue her life, if the could possible, without reproache and diffionor : and that chiefly the thould trust Proculeius about any man elfe about Cafar. And as

A for him felfe, that the thould not lament nor forowe for the miferable chaunge of his fortune at the end of his dayes: but rather that the should thinke him the more fortunate, for the former triumphes & honors he had received, confidering that while he lived he was the noblest and greatest Prince of the world, & that now he was ouercome, not cowardly, but valiantly, a ROMANE by an other ROMANE. As Antonius gaue the last gaspe, Proculeius came that was fent The death of from Cafar. For after Antonius had thrust his sworde in him selfe, as they carried him into the Antonius. tombes and monuments of Cleopatra, one of his gard called Dercetaus, tooke his fword with the which he had striken him selfe, and hidde it : then he secretly stale away, and brought Offauins Cafar the first newes of his death, & shewed him his sword that was bloodied. Cafar hea- of this week ring these newes, straight withdrewe him selfe into a secret place of his tent, and there burst for lamental Bout with teares, lamenting his hard and miserable fortune, that had bene his frende and bro-death. ther in law, his equall in the Empire, and companion with him in fundry great exploytes and battells. Then he called for all his frendes, and shewed them the letters Antonius had written to him, and his aunsweres also sent him againe, during their quarrell and strife: & how siercely and prowdly the other answered him, to all iust and reasonable matters he wrote vnto him. After this, he fent Proculeius, and commaunded him to doe what he could possible to get Cleo- Proculeius patra aliue, fearing least otherwise all the treasure would be lost: and furthermore, he thought sent by Octathat if he could take Cleopatra, and bring her aliue to Rome, the would maruelously beautific bring Cleopa and sette out his triumphe. But Cleopatra would neuer put her selfe into Proculeius handes, al- ma aliue. though they spake together. For Proculeius came to the gates that were very thicke & strong, and furely barred, but yet there were fome cranewes through the which her voyce might be heard, and so they without vnderstoode, that Cleopatra demaunded the kingdome of Agypr for her fonnes : and that Proculeius aunswered her, that she should be of good cheere, and not be affrayed to referre all vnto Casar. After he had viewed the place veriewell, he came and reported her aunswere vnto Casar. Who immediatly sent Gallus to speake once againe with her. and bad him purposely hold her with talke, whilest Froculeius did set vp a ladder against that high windowe, by the which Antonius was trifed vp, and came downe into the monument with two of his men hard by the gate, where Cleopatra stoode to heare what Gallus sayd vnto her. One of her women which was thut in her monumets with her faw Proculeius by chaunce as he came downe, and shreeked out: O, poore Cleopatra, thou are taken. Then when she sawe D Proculeius behind her as the came from the gate, the thought to have stabbed her felfe in with a short dagger she ware of purpose by her side. But Proculeius came sodainly vpon her, and ta- cleopara 14. king her by both the hands, faid vnto her. Cleopatra, first thou shalt doe thy selfe great wrong, ken and secondly vnto Cefar: to deprive him of the occasion and oportunitie, openly to shew his bountie and mercie, and to geue his enemies cause to accuse the most curteous and noble Prince that euer was, and to appeache him, as though he were a cruell and mercieleffe man, that were not to be trusted. So even as he spake the word, he tooke her dagger from her, and shooke her clothes for feare of any poyfon hidden about her. Afterwardes Casar sent one of his infranchifed men called Epaphroditus, whom he straightly charged to looke well vnto her, and to beware in any case that the made not her selfe away : and for the rest, to vie her with all E the curteste possible. And for him selfe, he in the meane time entred the citie of ALEXAN- Casar rocke DRIA, and as he went, talked with the Philosopher Arrius, and helde him by the hande, to the the citie of end that his contrie men should reuerence him the more, bicause they saw Casar so highly e- Casar greatly fleeme and honor him. Then he went into the show place of exercises, and so vp to his chaire honored Arof state which was prepared for him of a great height: and there according to his commaundement, all the people of ALBXANDRIA were affembled, who quaking for feare, fell downe on their knees before him, and craued mercie. Cafar bad them all stande vp, and told them openly that he forgatie the people, and pardoned the felonies and offences they had committed against him in this warre. First, for the founders sake of the same citie, which was Alexander the great: secondly, for the beawtie of the citie, which he muche esteemed and wondred Fat: thirdly, for the loue he bare vnto his verie frend Arrius. Thus did Cafar honor Arrius, who craued pardon for him felfe and many others, & specially for Philostratus, the eloquentest man, Philostratus of all the sophisters and Orators of his time, for present and sodaine speech: howbeit he fally the elegant his time, for named him felfe an Academicke Philosopher. Therefore, Cafar that hated his nature &come A present freeh dictions, would not heare his sure. Thereupon he let his gray beard grow long, and followed Arrise steppe by steppe in a long mourning gowne, still buffing in his cares this Greeke verse.

A vvife man it that he be vvife in deede, May by a wife man have the better speede.

Calar understanding this, not for the delire he had to deliver Philostratus of his feare, as to ridde Arriss of malice & enuy that might have fallen out against him:he pardoned him. Now Anyllus, An- touching Antonius fonnes, Antyllus, his eldeft fonne by Fulusa was flaine, bicause his schoolemaister Theodorus did betray him vnto the souldiers, who strake of his head. And the villaine fonne by Fultooke a pretious frome of great value from his necke, the which he did fowe in his girdell, and afterwards denied that he had it: but it was founde about him, and fo Cafar truffed him up for B it. For Cleopatraes children, they were verie honorablie kept, with their gouernors and traine that waited on them. But for Cafarion, who was fayd to be Iulius Cafars fonne: his mother Cleapatra had fent him vnto the Indians through ATHIOPIA, with a great fumme of money. But one of his governors also called Rhodon, even such an other as Theodorus, perswaded him to returne into his contrie, & told him that Cafar fent for him to gene him his mothers kingdom. Therefore Cafar did put Cafarion to death, after the death of his mother Cleopatra. Many C Princes great kings and Captaines did crave Antonius body of Octavius Cafar, to give him honorable burial: but Cafar would never take it from Cleopatra, who did sumptuously and royally cleopara bu burie him with her owne handes, whom Cafar suffred to take as much as the would to bestow ypon his funeralls. Now was the altogether our come with forow & passion of minde, for the had knocked her brest so pitiefully, that she had martired it, and indiuers places had raised vlsers and inflamacions, so that the fell into a feuer withal: whereof the was very glad, hoping thereby to have good colour to absteine from meate, and that so she might have dyed easely Olympus, without any trouble. She had a Philition called Olympus, whom the made prime of her intent, to thend he shoulde helpe her to ridde her out of her life: as Olympus wryteth him selfe, who wrote a booke of all these thinges. But Casar mistrusted the matter, by many coniectures he D had, and therefore did put her in feare, & threatned her to put her children to shameful death. With these threats, Cleopatra for feare yelded straight, as she would have yelded vnto strokes: Cafar came to and afterwards suffred her selse to be cured and dieted as they listed. Shortly after, Cafar came him felfe in person to see her, and to comfort her, Cleopatra being layed you a little low bedin poore estate, when she sawe Cesar come into her chamber, she sodainly rose vp, naked in her imocke, and fell downe at his feete marueloufly disfigured: both for that the had plucked her heare from her head, as also for that the had martired all her face with her nailes, and besides, her voyce was small and trembling, her eyes sonke into her heade with continual blubbering and moreouer, they might see the most parte of her stomake torne in sunder. To be short, her bodie was not much better then her minde: yet her good grace and comelynes, and the force of her beautie was not altogether defaced. But notwithstanding this ougly and pitiefull state of hers, yet the showed her selfe within, by her outward lookes and countenance. When Cafar had made her lye downe againe, and fate by her beddes fide: Cleopatra began to cleere and excuse her selfe for that she had done, laying all to the seare she had of Antonius. Cafar, in contrarie maner, reproued her in euery poynt. Then the fodainly altered her speache, and prayed him to pardon her, as though the were affrayed to dye, & defirous to line. At length, the gaue bim a breefe and memoriall of all the readie money & treasure the had. But by chaunce there stoode Selencus by, one of her Treasorers, who to seeme a good servant, came straight to Cafe Offauin Ca- to disprove Cleopatra, that she had not set in al, but kept many things back of purpose. Cleopatra was in fuch a rage with him, that the flew upon him, and tooke him by the heare of the head, and boxed him wellfauoredly. Cafarfell a laughing, and parted the fray. Alas, faid she, O Cafar: is not this a great thame and reproche, that thou having vouchelaued to take the peines

A excome vnto me, and hast done me this honor, poore wretche, and caltife creature, brought into this pitiefull & milerable estate: and that mine owne scruaints should come now to aca cuse me, though it may be I have referred some itells & trifles meete for women, but not for me (poore foule) to fet out my felfe withall, but meaning to geue fome pretie prefents & gifts vnto Octania and Linia, that they making meanes & intercession for me to thee, thou mightest vet extend thy fauor and mercie vpon me ? Cafar, was glad to heare her fay fo, perfwading him selfe thereby that the had yet a defire to saue her life. So he made her answere, that he did not only geue her that to dispose of at her pleasure, which she had kept backe, but further promifed to vie her more honorably and bountifully then the would thinke for : and to he tooke his leave of her, supposing he had deceived her, but in deede he was deceived him selfe. There R was a young gentleman Cornelius Dolabella, that was one of Cafars very great familiars, & befides did beare no euil will vnto Cleopatra. He sent her word secretly as the had requested him! that Calar determined to take his iorney through SVRIA. & that within three dayes he would fende her away before with her children. When this was tolde Cleopatra, the requested Cafar Cleopatra that it would please him to suffer her to offer the last oblations of the dead, vnto the soule of meth of the Antonius. This being graunted her, the was carried to the place where his tombe was, & there w. C. of a, as falling downe on her knees, imbracing the tombe with her women, the teares running downe though the her cheekes, the began to speake in this forte: O my deare Lord Antonius, not long sithence I in buried thee here, being a free woman: and now I offer vnto thee the funerall fprinklinges and cleopatrace oblations, being a captine and prisoner, and yet I am forbidden and kept from tearing & mur-lamentarion r dering this captine body of mine with blowes, which they carefully gard and keepe, onely to triumphe of thee: looke therefore henceforth for no other honors, offeringes, nor facrifices " from me, for these are the last which Cleopatra can gene thee, sith nowe they carie her away. " Whilest we lived together nothing could sever our companies: but now at our death. I feare "

If therefore the gods where thou art now haue any power and authoritie, fith our gods here haue forfaken vs : fuffer not thy true frend " and louer to be caried away aliue, that in me, they triumphe of thee: but receive me with thee, and let me be buried in one felfe tombe with thee. For though my griefes and miferies be inh finite, vet none hath grieued me more, nor that I could lesse beare withall: then this small time, " which I have bene drive to live alone without thee. Then having ended these doleful plaints, ' and crowned the tombe with garlands and fundry no fegaves, and maruelous louingly imbraced the fame: the commaunded they should prepare her bath, and when the had bathed and washed her selfe, she fell to her meate, and was sumptuously served. Nowe whilest the was at dinner, there came a contrieman, and brought her a basker. The fouldiers that warded at the gates, asked him straight what he had in his basket. He opened the basket, and tooke out the leaues that couered the figges, and shewed them that they were figges he brought. They all of them maruelled to fee so goodly figges. The contrieman laughed to heare them, and bad them take some if they would. They beleued he told them truely, and so bad him carie them F in. After Cleopatra had dined, the fent a certaine table written and fealed vnto Cefar, and commaunded them all to go out of the tombes where the was, but the two women, then the thus the dores to her. Cafar when he received this table, and began to read her lamentation and petition, requesting him that he would let her be buried with Antonius, founde straight what she ment, and thought to have gone thither him felfe: howbeit he fent one before in all haft that might be to fee what it was. But when they had opened the dores, they founde Cleopatra starke dead, layed vpon a bed of gold, attired and araied in her royall robes, and one of her two cloparate women, which was called Iras, dead at her feete: and her other woman called Charmion halfe woman deal hidden poyfon in a hollow rafer which the caried in the heare of her head; and yet was there no marke leene of her bodie, or any figne difcerned that the was poyloned, neither also did they finde this serpent in her tombe. But it was reported onely, that there were seene certeine B fresh steppes or trackes where it had gone, on the tombe side toward the sea, and specially by the dores fide. Some fay also, that they found two litle pretie bytings in her arme, scant to be discerned: the which it seemeth Casar him selse gaue credit vnto, bicause in his triumphe he carried Cleopatraes image, with an Afpicke byting of her arme. And thus goeth the report of her death. Now Cafar, though he was maruelous forie for the death of Cleopatra, yet he wondred at her noble minde and corage, and therefore commaunded the should be nobly buried, and layed by Antonius: and willed also that her two women shoulde have honorable buriall, Cleopatra dved being eight and thirtie yeare olde, after the had raigned two and twenty yeres, and governed above foureteene of them with Antonius. And for Antonius, some say that he) lived three and fitte yeares; and others fay, fix and fiftie. All his statues, images, and mettalls, C were plucked downe and ouerthrowen, fauing those of Cleopatra which stoode still in their places, by meanes of Archibius one of her frendes, who gaue Cafar a thowfande talentes that they should not be handled, as those of Antonius were, Antonius left feuen children by three wines, of the which, Cafar did put Antyllus, the eldest some he had by Fuluia, to death. Octavia his wife tooke all the rest, and brought them vp with hers, and maried Cleopatra, Antonim daughter, vnto king Iubs, a maruelous curteous & goodly Prince. And Antonius, the fonne of Fuluia came to be fo great, that next vnto Agrippa, who was in greatest estimacion about Cafar, and next vnto the children of Linia, which were the second in estimacion: he had the third place. Furthermore, Octavia having had two daughters by her first husband Marcellus, and a fonne also called Marcellus: Cafar maried his daughter vnto that Marcellus, and so did adopt D him for his sonne. And Octavia also maried one of her daughters vnto Agrippa. But when Marcellus was deade, after he had bene maried a while, Octania perceiuing that her brother Cafar was very busie to choose some one among his frends, whom he trusted best to make his fonne in law: the perswaded him, that Agrippa should mary his daughter, (Marcellus widow) and leave her owne daughter. Cafar first was contented withall, and then Agrippa: and so she afterwards tooke away her daughter and maried her vnto Antonius, and Agrippa maried Iulia, Cafars daughter. Now there remained two daughters more of Offauia and Antonius. Domitius A Enobarbus maried the one: and the other, which was Antonia, fo fayer and vertuous a young Ladie, was maried vnto Drusus the sonne of Linea, and sonne in law of Casar. Of this mariage, came Germanicus and Clodius: of the which, Clodius afterwards came to be Emperour. And of E the fonnes of Germanicus, the one whole name was Caius, came also to be Emperour: who, atter he had licentiously raigned a time, was flaine, with his wife and daughter. Agrippina also, having a sonne by her first husbande AEnobarbus called Lucius Domitius: was afterwardes maried vnto Clodius, who adopted her fonne, and called him Nero Germanicus. This Nero was Emperour in our time, and flue his owne mother, and had almost destroyed the Empire of Rome, through his madnes and wicked life, being the fift Emperour of Rome after Antonius.

THE COMPARISON OF

Demetrius with Antonius.

Ow, fithence it falleth out, that Demetrius and Antonius were one of them much like to the other, having fortune a like divers and variable vnto them: let vs therefore come to confider their power and authoritie, and how they came to be fo great. First of all, it is certaine that Theporers Demetrius power and greatnes fell vnto him by inheritance from his Demetrius father Antigonus who became the greatest and mightiest Prince of all the successors of Alexander, and had won the most parte of Asia, before Demetrius came of full age. Antonius in contrary maner, borne of an honest man, who otherwise was no man of warre, and had not left him any meane to arise to such greatnes: durst take voon him to contend for the Empire with Cafar, that had no right vnto it by inheritaunce, but yet made him felfe successor of the power. the which the other by great paine and trauell had obteyned, and by his owne industrie be-D came so great, without the helpe of any other: that the Empire of the whole worlde being deuided into two partes, he had the one halfe, and tooke that of the greatest countenaunce and power. Antonius being absent, oftentimes ouercame the PARTHIANS in battell by his Lieutenaunts, and chased away the barbarous people dwelling about mourt Caucasus, vnto the fea Hyrcanium: infomuche as the thing they most reproue him for, did most witnes his greatnes. For, Demetrius father made him gladly marrie Phila, Antipaters daughter, although the was too old for him:bicause she was of a nobler house then him selfe. Antonius on thother fide was blamed for marying of Cleopatra, a Queene that for power and nobilitie of blood, excelled all other kings in her time, but Arfaces: and moreouer made him felfe fo great, that others thought him worthie of greater things, then he him selfe required. Now for the defire Dementur & E that moued the one and the other to conquer realmes: the defire of Demetrius was viblameable & iuft, defiring to raigne ouer people, which had bene governed at all times, & defired to be gouerned by kings. But Antonius desire was altogether wicked & tyrannicall : who fought to keepe the people of Rome in bondage and subjection, but lately before rid of Cafair raigne and gouernment. For the greatest and most famous exployte Antonius ever did in watres (to wit, the warre in the which he ouerthrew Cassius and Brutus) was begon to no other ende, but to depriue his contriemen of their libertie and freedom. Demetrius in contrarie maner, before fortune had ouerthrowen him, neuer left to fet GR & CR at libertie, and to drive the garrifons away, which kept the cities in bondage: and not like Antonius, that bofted he had flaine them that had fet Rome at libertie. The chiefest thing they commended in Antonius, was his libera- The Ubrali. Flitte and bountie: in the which Demetrius excelled him fo farre, that he gaue more to his ene- it and bonnthies, then Antonius did to his frends : although he was marueloully well thought of, for the tie of Dome-

his enemies be buried that were flaine in battel, and returned vitto Ptolomy, all the prisoners he A penerius to had taken, with great giftes and presentes he gaue them. They were both in their prosperitie. verie riotouslie and licentiouslie genen: but yet no man can euer fay, that Demetrius did at any time let flippe any oportunitie or occasion to followe great matters, but onelie gaue him selfe in deede to pleasure, when he had nothing else to doe. And further, to say truely, he tooke pleasure of Lamia, as a man woulde haue a delight to heare one tell tales, when he hath nothing else to doe, or is desirous to sleepe: but in deede when he was to make any preparation for warre, he had not then luey at his darts end, nor had his helmet perfumed, nor came not out of Ladies closets, picked and princt to go to battell: but he let all dauncing and sporting alone, and became as the Poet Euripides faith, The fouldier of Mars, cruell, and bloodie.

But to conclude, he neuer had ouerthrowe or misfortune through negligence, nor by delaying time to followe his owne pleasure: as we see in painted tables, where Omphale secretlie stealeth away Hercules clubbe, and tooke his Lyons skinne from him . Euen so Cleopatra oftentimes vnarmed Antonius, and intifed him to her, making him lose matters of great importaunce, and verie needefull iorneys, to come and be dandled with her, about the rivers of Canobus, and Taphofiris. In the ende, as Paris fledde from the battell, and went to hide him selse in Helens armes: euen so did he in Cleopatraes armes, or to speake more properlie, Paris hidde him selfe in Helens closet, but Antonius to followe Cleopatra, fledde and lost the victo-

Furthermore, Demetrius had many wives that he had maried, and all at one time: the which was not diffalowable or not forbidden by the kinges of MACEDON, but had benevied & ...Intonius wines. from Philippe and Alexanders time, as alfolding Lysimachus and Ptolomy had, and did honor Antonius the all them that he maried. But Antonius first of all maried two wives together, the which neuer Romane durst doe before, but him selfe. Secondly, he put away his first Romane wife. which he had lawfully maried for the loue of a straunge woman, he fondly fell in fancy withried two wines all, and contrarie to the lawes and ordinaunces of Rome. And therefore Demetrius mariages sogether. neuer hurt him, for any wrong he had done to his wives: but Antonius contrarily was vndone

For the historiographers write, that they would not suffer dogges to Dogges not come into the castell of ATHENS, bicause of all beastes he is too busie with bitcherie: and Defuffred in Athens caffle, metrius, in Mineruses temple it selse lay with Curtisans, and there defiled many citizens wines. bicaufe of And besides all this, the horrible vice of crueltie, which a man would thinke were least minbischerie.

And to conclude, Antonius by his incontinen-The love and cie, did no hurte but to him felfe: and Demetrius did hurte vnto all others. Demetrius neuer impletie: the hurte any of his frendes: and Antonius suffered his Vncle by his mothers side to be slaine, James (age that he might have his will of Civero to kill him: a thing so damnable, wicked, and cruell of metrius and it selfe, that he hardlie deserued to have bene pardoned, though he had killed Cicero, to have faued his Vncles life. Nowe where they fallefied and brake their othes, the one making artabazus prisoner, and the other killing of Alexander: Antonius out of doubt had best cause, and instest colour. For Artabazus had berrayed him, and forfaken him in Man . A. But Denie trius (as divers doe reporte) devised a false matter to accuse Alexander, to cloke the mutther he had committed: and some thinke he did accuse him, to whom he him selfe had done Descript to injurie vnto: and was not reuenged of him, that woulde doe him injurie. Furthermore, De-Amoni is all's metrius him selfe did many noble feates in warre, as we have recited of him before: and con-trarilie Antonius, when he was northere in person, wanne many famous and great victories by his Lieutenaumes: and they were both ouerthrowen being personallie in battell, buryet not both after one forte. For the one was for faken of his men being Maced on fans, and the other contrarily forfooke his that were Romanes: for he fled, & left them that ventred their lives for his honor. So that the fault the one did was, that he made them his enemies that fought for him: and the fault in the other, that he fo beaftlie left them that loued him bell.

and were most faithfull to him. And for their deathes, a man can not praise the one not

A the other, but yet Demetrius death the more reproachefull. For he suffered him selfe to be taken prisoner, and when he was sent away to be kept in a straunge place, he had the hartto live yet three yeare longer, to serve his mouth and bellie, as brute beaftes doe. Antonius on the other fide flue him felfe, (to confesse a troth) cowardly, and miserably, to his great paint and griefe: and yet was it before his bodie came into his enemies hands.

THE LIFE OF Artaxerxes.

Reaxerxes, the first of this name of all the kinges of Persia, a noble and curteous Prince as any of all his house: was surnamed long hand. bicause his right hand was longer then his left, and he was the sonne of king Xerxes. But the seconde, whose life we presentlie intend to The partiage wryte, was furnamed Mnemon, as muche to fay, great memorie : and Mnemon. he was the fonne of the daughter of the first Artaxerxes. For king Daorius, and his wife Parysatis, had foure sonnes: of the which, the eldest was this Artaxerxes, the seconde Cyrus, and two other younger.

Oftanes and Oxathres. Cyrus from the beginning bare the name of the former auncient Cyrus, which in the Persian tongue fignifieth the funne. But Artaxerxes was called before Arficas, although Dinon wryteth, that he was called Oarfes. Howebeit it is vnlikelie that Ctesias (although his bookes otherwise be full of fables, and as vntrue as they are founde) should forget the name of the Prince with whom he dwelt, whom he ferued and continuallie followed, both him, his wife, and children. Cyrus from his cradell was of a hotte sturring minde, and Artaxerxes in contrarie manner, more mylde and gentle in all his actions The diserter and doinges. He was maried to a verie fayer Ladie, by his father and mothers commaunded bernixe Create ment: & afterwards kept her against their wills, being forbidden by them. For king Darius his and Anaxonfather, having put his fonnes wives brother to death, he woulde also have put her to death; xee F but her husband with teares made suche humble sute to his mother for her, that with muche a doe, he did not onely gette pardon for her life, but graunt also that the shoulde not be put from him. This notwithstanding, his mother alwayes loued Cyrus better then him, and praied QQQQ iii

Arficas, furnamed Artaxerxes, was affigned king of PERSIA, & Cyrus gouernor of Lydia, and the kings Lieutenaunt generall of all the low contries of Asia toward the sea side. Shortly afterking Darius death, the new king Artaxerxes went vnto Palargades, there to be confecrated and announted king, by the Priestes of the contrie of Persia. The place of this Pasargades, is B of the Priestes that had bene Cyrus schoolemaister in his youth, and had taught him magicke:

There are also certeine other secret ceremonies which fa, at Pafar- they must keepe, and none doe know, but the verie Priestes them selues. Some fed vato his brodier Arta doe reporte, that Cyrus was apprehended vpon this simple accusacion by word of mouth. Oxerxes. thers write also, that Cyrus came into the temple, and hiding him selfe, he was taken with the Cyrus lay in waite to kill maner, and bewraied by the Prieft. So as he was going to fuffer death, his mother tooke Cyrus Ariaxerxes. in her armes, and wounde the heare of her heade about his necke, and tyed him straightfy to Note the flather: and withall the wept to bitterly, and made fuche pitiefull mone vnto the king her fonne, terie and dif-Emulation of that through her intercession, the king graunted him his life, & sent him againe into his contrie and gouernment. But this fatisfied not Cyrus, neither did he fo muche remember the king his brothers fauor vnto him, in graunting him his life:as he did the despite he had offred him. D to be made prisoner. Insomuch that for this grudge and euill will, he euer after had a greater desire then before to be king. Some wryters alleage, that he entred into actuall rebellion against his brother by force of armes, bicause he had not sufficient reuenue to defray the ordinary expence of his house: howbeit it is a meere folly to say so. For though he had had no other helpe but his mother, he might have had of her what he would have taken, and defired. Againe, to shew that of him selfe he had abilitie enough: we neede but alleage the souldiers and straungers he gaue pay vnto, in divers places, as Xenophon wryteth. For he brought them nor all together into one armie, bicause he desired to kepe his enterprise as secret as he could but he had frendes and feruaunts that leauied them in divers places, and vnder divers colours. And furthermore, he had his mother alway about the king, that cleered all fuspicions conceiued against him. He him selse also on the other side, whilest he made these preparacions, wrote verie humbly vnto his brother, fomtime asking fomwhat of him, and an other time accufing Tisaphernes: all to blinde the king, to make him thinke that he bent all his malice and fpite against him, besides that the king of his owne nature was somwhat dull, and slow, which the common people thought to proceede of his curtefie and good nature. At his first comcharacterist, and ming to the crowne, he followed the first Artaxerxes goodnes and curtesie, by whom he had his name. For he gaue more easie audience vnto suters, he did also more honorably reward & recompence those that had deserved well: & he vsed such moderacion in punishing of offendors, that it appeared he did it not of any malicious minde and defire of reuenge, nor yet of will to hurte any man. When he had any thing geuen him, he tooke it as thankefully, as they F offered it him, and did as willingly and frankely also gene againe. For, how litle a thing soener was offered him, he tooke it well. And it is reported that one Remises on a time presented him

A a maruelous fayer pomegarner. By the funne fayd he this man in a short time of a litle towner would make a great citie, he that would make him gouernor of it. Another time there was a poore laborer feing euery ma giue the king a present, some one thing, some another as he pasfed by them he having nothing at hand to give him, ranne to the rivers fide, & tooke both his hands full of water, and came and offred it him. King Artaxerxes was so glad of it, that he sent ibbraline to him in a cuppe of massy gold, a thowsand Darecks, which were peeces of gold so named, bi- apare man cause the image of Darius was stamped vpon them. And vnto one Euclidas a LACEDE MONI- that gate an, that presumed to give him bold words, it pleased him to aunswer him by one of his Cap- water. taines: thou may ft fay what thou lyft, and I as king, may fay and doe what I lyft. Another time as he was a hunting, Tiribazus shewed the king his gowne that was all to tattered: well, fayd B the king, and what wouldest thou have me to doe? Tiribazus aunswered him, I praye your Tiribazus grace take another, and give me that you have on. The king did so, and told him: Tiribazus, I lightnes, and giue thee my gowne, but I commaund thee not to weare it. Tiribazus tooke it, and cared not liberalisis, for the kings commaundement that he should not weare it, not that he was any euill disposed man, but bicause he was a fond light headed fellowe that cared for nothing: thereuppon he straight put the kings gowne on his backe, and not contented therewith, he did besides set on many iewells of gold which kings onely are wont to weare, and womens trinckets and ornaments. Therewithal euery man in the Court murmured at him, bicause it was a presumption. directly against the lawes and ordinaunces of Persia. Howbeit the king did but laugh at it. & tolde him; I give thee leave Tiribazus to weare those womens gawdes as a woman, and the kingsrobe as a foole. Furthermore, where the manner was in PERSTA that no person sate as the kings bord, but his mother and wife, of the which, his mother fate vppermost, & his wife lowermost: Artaxarxes made his two brethren Oftanes and Oxathres sit at his owne bord, But vet he pleased the PERSIANS best of all, bicause he was content his wife Statyra should fit o- Statinaking penly in her charret, and that the might be seene and reuerenced by the other Ladves of the contry. And this made him fingularly beloued of the people. Now, fuch as defired innouativnto Clearchus, commaunding him to obey Cyrus in any thing he would commaund him. So Cyrus did fet forward to make warre against his brother, having leavied a great number of fighting men of barbarous nations, and of GRECIANS, little leffe then thirteene thowfand men: sometime aduertising one cause, sometime another, why he leavied such a multitude of men. But his purpose could not be long dissembled: for Tisaphernes went him selfe vnto the Court, to bringe newes of his attempt. Then all the Court was straight in an vprore withall.

Many men also did accuse the Queene mother, for the practise of this warre, & all her friends

& servaunts were vehemently suspected to be conspyrators with Cyrus: but the greatest thing loully to fee this warre begon against king Artaxer xes her husband, and incessantly cryed out on her: O, where is the faith thou vowedit by othe? whereto are thy intercessions come thou

F that troubled Parysatis most, was Queene Statyra her Daughter in lawe, who stormed marueon and chaunge, and that could not away with quiet life: they gaue out that the Realme of Perstarequired such a Prince as Cyrus, that was liberall of nature, given to armes, & greatly rewarded his feruaunts, and that the greatnes of the Empire of Persia floode in neede of a king, whole mind was bent to high attempts and noble enterprises. So Cyrus thereuppon be-

D gan to make warre vpon his brother, not onely trusting vnto them that were of the lowe contries about him, but hoping of those also in the high provinces neare vnto the king. Further-Ariantes. more he wrote also vnto the LACED & MONIANS, to pray them to send him men of warre, prodeffull promise mifing to give the footemen they fent, horses: and the horsemen, coches: landed men, whole feet villages: and to those that had villages, to give them cities. Besides all this, that for the ordinary wages of them that should serue him in this warre, he would not pay them by accompt. but by full measure: and boasting largely of him selfe, he sayd he had a greater mind then his brother, that he could better away with hardnes then he, that he vnderstoode magick better then he, and that he could drinke more wine then he, and cary it better. And that the king his brother in contrary manner was fo womanishe and fearefull, that when he went a hunting, he F durst scarce get vp vpon his horse backe: and when he went to the warres, he would hardly take his charriot. When the LACED EMONIANS had red his letters, they fent a litle ferowle

ARTAXERXES. 1016 madeft for the pardon of his life: who now conspyreth his brothers death? By saving of his A life art not thou now the cause of this warre and troubles we see at hand? After this reproch and shame received by Statira, Parysatis, being a cruell and malicious woman of nature, so has ted her, that from thenceforth the fought all the wayes the could to put her to death . And Dinon the Historiographer fayth, that during this warre, she did execute her wicked purpose voon her: but Ctesias writeth, that it was after the warre. And therfore it is liker, that he being daily in the king of PERSIAES Court, should certainely knowe the tyme when she did execute her treason against her, and also there is no cause why he should rather write it in any other time, then in that in the which the facte was done: although in many other places he commonly vieth to fitten, and to write denises of his owne head. Therefore let vs leave the report of this fact to the felfe same time and place as he hath written it. Now when Cyrus drew neare B vnto his brothers contry, he had newes, and a rumor ranne through his campe, that the king was not determined to come and fight with him fo foone: and that he ment first to goe further into PERSIA, and to tary there til he had gathered his army together out of all parts. And for proofe hereof, the king having cast a great trenche of ten yardes broad, and as many high, the space of soure hundred furlong in length: he left it without gard, and let Cyrus winne it. who came on further without any refistaunce, even to the very citie selfe of BABY LON, Howbeit in the ende, Tiribazus (as it is reported) was the first man that durst tell the king, that he should not flie fight in that fort, nor hide him selfe in the furdest part of PERSIA, leaving his enemy the Realmes of MEDIA, BABYLON, and Sysa: confidering also that he had many moc fouldiers in readines then his enemye, and an infinite number of Captaines more skilfull, and G abler to give counsell, and to fight, then he was. These words of Tiribazus made the king alter his mind, and to determine to give battell as soone as he could. Thereuppon he marched forward against his enemie, with nyne hundred thowsand fighting men, excellently well armed, and marching in very good order. That maruelously aftonied Cyrus men, and made them affrayd at the first, when they saw them in so excellent good order before them: for that they were dispersed stragling here and there without any order, and men ynarmed, trusting too much in them felues, in despising of their enemie: so that Cyrus had much a doe to fet his men army, of nyne bundeed than Sand fighting men, againfi in battell raye, and yet was it with great noyle and tumult. But the GRECIANS wondred most they could come to joyne with theirs. But fith this battell is described by divers Historiogra-Xemphon the phers, but specially by Xenophon, who hath (as a man would say) lively set it out to the eye, & fetteth it forth to the Reader, not as a battell already fought, but prefently a fighting, stirring vp their mindes as if them selues were in the action and instant daunger, he hath so passingly fet it downe : it were but a folly therefore of me to take vppon me to make any further descri- E ption of it, fauing to touch some speciall poynts worthy of note, which he peraduenture hath left out. As, the place where the battell was fought, is called Covnaxa, fine hundred furlongs from BABY LON: and how that before the battell, Clearchus gaue Cyrus counfell to keepe behind the squadron of the GRECIANS; and not to hazard his person among the first; and that Cyrus aunswered him, what sayest thou Clearchus? wouldest thou have me that strives to be king to shew my selfe vnworthy to be a king? But Cyrus having made this fault, not standing vpon his safetie and garde, but ouer rashely thrusting him selfe into great daunger: Clearchus felfe also committed as great a fault (if it were not worse) when he would not set his men in order directly against the battel of the enemies, where the kings person stoode, but went and pent them vp by the rivers side, being affrayd least they should have bene compassed in behind. For if he would have looked fo straightly to him felfe, and have provided every way for his fafetie, that no man might come to hurt him: he should have kept him selfe at home, and of all other, when they sawe the kinges armye marche in so good order of battell without any infinite multitude of people: and supposed they would have made such a noyse, that one of them should not have heard another. Where in deede to the contrary, all was so well marshalled, specially bicause he had placed before his battell the best carts he had armed with fiethes, and drawen with the ftrongest and biggest great horse he had in all his armie: hoping by the fiercenes and furye of their careere, to breake into the ranckes of the enemies, before noyfe. For they thought to have feene a wonderfull great diforder and confusion, in such an B

A not have flurred one foote out of the dores. But fith he had comen to farre, as from the low contries of As 1 A, vnto the place where the field was fought, and vncompelled, onely to put Cyrus in his fathers feate & imperiall crowne, to goe choose a place in the battell, not where he might doe his Lord best service that had hyered him , but rather where he might fight more at his ease, and at lesse daunger : it was even as much, as if through cowardlines his wits had bene taken from him when he should have fought, or that through treason he had for laken his enterprise. For, to proue that the trowpes which were about the kinges person, had neuer bene able to have received the charge of the GRECIANS, and that those being ouerthrowen, the king had bene flayne in the field, or els forced to flie, and that Cyrus had wonnethe field, and by this victorie had bene king : the fuccesse of this battell doth plainely B shewe it. And therefore Clearchus ouer curious respect, descrued more blame for the losse of this battell: then Cyrus ouerhardines. For if king Artaxerxes would have chosen or wished a place where the GRECIANS might have done him leffe hurt: he could not have devised a fitter place that was fo farre from him, and from whence the GRECIANS could neither fee nor heare what was done where he was as it fell out in fequell. For Cyrus was flayne before he could prenaile by Clearchus victorie, he was so farre from him : and furthermore, Cyrus therein knew before what was meetelt to be done. For he commaunded Clearchus to place him felfe with his company in the middest of the battell: who aunswered him, he should take no thought for nothing, for he would fee all things well ordered. And when he had fayd for he marred all afterwardes: For where the GRECIANS were, they ouerthrewe the barbarous C people that made head against them, & had the in chase while they were weary of following of them. Cyrus being mounted upon a whor flirring horse, that had a hard head, and was very flerce and dogged, called Pafacas, as Ctefias writeth: Artagerfes, the gouernor of the prouince of the Cadvsians, spyed him a farre of, and when he had found him, clapped spurres Anagusti to his horse, and came with full cariere vnto him, and cryed out: O traytor, and most vnfaithfull and desperate man, thou now dishonorest the name of Cyrus (which is the goodliest and wince of Care most honorablest name of all the Persians) for that thou hast brought so valliant Greci-distinct ANS hether to fo wicked an enterprise, to spoyle the Persians goods, in hope to destroy thy charge von foueraine Lord and onely brother, who hath an infinite number of flaues and feruaunts farre honester men then thou wilt be while thou livest, and that thou shalt presently knowe by D proofe, for thou shalt dye before thou see the king thy brothers face: and therewithall he threw his dart at him with all the force he had . But Cyrus armor was so good, that it pearsed

When Artagerses had given him that blowe, he presently turned his horse. But Cyrus therewithall threw a dart at him so happily, that he slue him right in the place about the bone that ioyneth the two shoulders together: so that the head of his dart, ranne quite through his cyrus flue necke. Nowe, that Cyrus flue Artagerses with his owne hands in the field, all the Historiogra- Artagerses. phers doe agree vpon it but for the death of Cyrus, bicaufe Xenophon toucheth it but a litle by the way, for that he was not present in the very place wherehe was slaynes it shal not be hurtfull particularly to fet downe the manner thereof, both according to the report of Dinon, and

E also of Ctestas. First, Dinon writeth, that after Cyrus had flayne Artagerses, he went with great Dinonvepor fury, and flue in amongest the trowpe of them which were nearest vnto thekings person, and ofcome death that he came so neare the king, that he slue his horse starke dead under him, and the king fell to the ground withall. But Tiribazus that was hard by him, straight mounted the king againe vpon an other horse, and sayd vnto him: your grace will remember this battell another day. for it is not to be forgotten . And Cyrus clapping spurres againe to his horse, threwe an other dart at Artaxerxes, and hit him. But at the third charge, the king tolde them that were about him, he could not abide this, and that he had rather dye then fuffer it: fo there with all he sputring his horse to charge Cyrus, (who came fiercely and desperatly, having an infinite number of blowes with darts throwen at him on enery fide) threw his dart at him alfo. So did all those

F that were about his person: and so was Cyrus flayne in this conflict. Some saye, that he was flavne with the wounde the kinge his brother gaue him. Others fave, that it was a man at armes of the contry of CARIA, vnto whom the king for reward of his good feruice, gaue him

on his feete, although he thought he had won the battell: bicause he heard his enemies slying D about him cry, the gods faue king Cyrus, and they prayed him to pardon them, and to receive them to mercy. But in the meane time, there came certaine poore men of the citie of Cav-NV s, who followed the kings campe, getting their liuing as drudges and flaues, to doe most vile feruice. They is ined with the trowpe where Cyrus was, supposing they had bene the kings men: but when they perceived in the ende by the red coates they ware vpon their armors, that they were enemies, for that the kings men ware white coates: there was one among the rest that valliantly strake at Cyrus behind with his pertisan, not knowing in deede that it was Cyrus. The blowe lighted full on the hamme of his legge and cut his finewes fo, that Cyrus fell withall, and falling, by misfortune fell vpon a great stone with his browe, where he had bene hurt before, that he died forthwith. Thus doth Ctefias report it, where me thinketh he cutteth E his throate with a dull edged knife, he hath such a doe to bring Cyrus to his ende. Now after Cyrus was dead, Artafiras, one of king Artaxerxes Euenukes, whome they called the kings eye in the Court: paffing by a horfebacke, knewe Cyrus Euenukes that mourned very pit fully lamenting the death of their mafter. So he asked the Euenuke whome Cyrus loued best: who is that that is dead, O Parife as, that thou weepest so bitterly? Parife as aunswered him againe, seet thou not Artafras, that it is Crrus but newly dead? Artafras wondred much when he sawe him. So he comforted the Euenuke, and willed him in no case to goe from the body; and in the meane time he gallopped a pace to the king, who thought he had loft all, and was very ill besides, both for the great thirst he suffred, as also for his wound he had on his breast. Nowe when the Euenuke came vnto the king, & told him with a fmyling countenaunce the newes, F how he had feene Cyrus dead: The king was fo joyfull at the newes, that he was defirous him felfe forthwith to goe vnto the place where he lay to fee him, and commaunded Artafracto

This was not for Clearchus fake, but for an olde canckered malice Parysatu had long time borne in her hart against Queene Statira: bicause she saw wel enough, The case of that the credit & authoritie her felf had with the king, was in respect of a sonnes duty & obediece to his mother, & in contrary maner, Statiraes credit & authoritie had a better ground & hate unto her Daughter in foudació, bicause it came of the loue & good wil the king did beare her. And this is the onely lar, Statira, cause that made her to practise the death of Quene Statira, having determined that her self, or daughter in law, must nedes dye. Now Quene mother had one of the women of her chamber onely knew it, but otherwise that it was against her will: & that he that made the poyson, was D one Belitaras, but Dinon calleth him Melantas. Now, though in outward femblance and shew Queene mother & Statira semed to haue forgotte all malice betwene them, & that they bega again one of them to keepe company with the other, & did eate & drinke together yet one of them mistrusted the other, & tooke great heede to them selues, both of them eating one selse meate, & in one dishe together, and were both served with one self officers & men. In PERSIA there is a litle bird, of the which all the parts of it is excellent good to eate, & is ful of fat within: so that it is thought it liueth by ayer & dewe, and in the Persian tongue they cal it Ryntaces. Paryfatis, as Ctesias fayth, tooke one of these birdes, and cut it in the middest with a litle knife, the which was poyfoned onely on one of the fides, and gaue that halfe which was poyfoned vnto Statira. So Quene Statira presetly fel fick of the diffease wherof the died, with greuous panges & gripings in her bowels, & found plainly that the was poyfoned by Parylatis meanes: wheruppo she told the king as much, who was of the same opinion, & thought it was his mother, bicause he knew her cruel reueging mind, that neuer pardoned any, against who she conceived any grudge. The king therefore to know the troth, when his wife Statira was dead, apprehended all his mothers houthold feruaunts & officers, & did put them to torments, to make them confesse the troth, saving Gigis, whome Queene mother kept close in her chamber a long time, & would neuer suffer the king to have her: who earne-'stly requested her to deliuer her vnto him . Notwithstanding, Gigis her selse at length prayed F Quene mother to give her leave one night to go home to her house. The king vnderstanding it, layed waite for her, and intercepted her by the way: and when she was taken, he condemned her to suffer the paynes of death ordeyned for poysoners, the which in Persiais execured in this manner. They make them put their head upon a great plaine stone, and with an o- The punishther stone they presse and strike it so long, till they have dashed the braynes of the malefactor menisor perout of their head. After this fort was Gigis put to death. Now for Parylatis his mother, the king fas did her no other hurt, nor fayd no more vnto her, but confined her vnto BABYLON according to her defire, & sware, that whilest she lived, he would never see BABY LON. In this state stoods the affaires of the king. But now, Artaxerxes having done the vimost he could to have ouercomen the GRECIANS which came to make warre with him in the hart of his Realme, and

For, at the first coffict he ouerthrew Tisaphernes (the him of king of Persiaes Lieuetenant) in battel, and made the most part of the cities of GRECE that demon, maare in A sta, to rebel against him. Artaxerxes loking into this warre, & wisely considering what kith warre with the Perway & meanes he was to take, to make warre with the GR MCIANS: he fent into GR MCE one flow, Hermocrates a Rhodian, (of great credit about him) with a maruelous fume of gold & filuer, bountifully to bestow in gifts among the nobilitie & chiefe rulers of the cities of GRECE, to make all the other GR &CIANS to rile against the LACED &MONIANS. Hermocrates wilely executed his comiffion, for he made the chiefest cities of GRECE to rebel against LACEDE MON fothat all PELOPONNES VS being vp in armes, and in great garboyle, the Ephoriat LACEDE-D MON were inforced to fend for Agefilaus home again. Agefilaus being fory to depart out of A-STA, faid vnto his friends: that the king of Passia had driven him out of his Realme with thirty thow fand archers: bicaule that the PERSIAN coyne is staped with an archer, having a bow in The Postan his hand. Artaxerxes also draue the LACED EMONIANS Out of all their iurisdiction by sea, by some, how is shamped. the meanes of Conon, general of the ATHENIANS, who Pharnabazas (one of his Lieuetenants) "prampeu, had wonne to take his part. For Conon, after he was ouerthrowen in battel at a place called the deane the Lagoates river, kept ever after in the lle of CYPRVs, not so much for the safetie of his person, as from all their allo for that it was a mete place to stay in, vntil the wars of GR ECE were appealed. He know-dominion by ing that the deuise he had in his head, lacked power to put it in execution, & on the contrary see side, that the power of the king lacked a man of deepe indgemet to be imployed he wrote let-E ters vnto him of his deuise what he thought to doe, straightly charging him whom he deliuered his letters vnto, that if he could possibly, he should cause the same to be deliuered vnto the king by Zenon the CRETAN, one of the kings dauncers, or by one Polyeritus his Philition, born in the city of MENDE: & in both their absences, then to give it vnto Ctesias, to deliver vnto the king. It chaunced to that this letter came to the hands of Ctesias: who as it is reported) added moreouer vnto the cotents of the letter, that the king should send him vnto Conon, bicause he was a necessary man to be employed in his seruice, but specially by sea, Ctessas sayth not so, but writeth that the king of his owne voluntary motion gaue him this charge. Therefore one faid at that time in the presence of king Agesilaus: O how vishappy is poore GRECE at this day, when the LACED EMONIANS come to follow the PERSIANS? But Agefilaus presently auswered him againe, not so, said he; but rather the PERSI-ANS followe the LACED & MONIANS. Notwithstanding, this wife aunswer Agesilaus made.did not take away the thame of the fact: & fhortly after, the LACED EMONIANS loft the battell of LEVCTRES, & therewith also the figniorie & principalitie they had kept of long time ouer all GRECE, although they had loft their estimation before, for colenting to so shameful & dishonorable a peace. This word was rather to cut him for his treason, then for any remebrance of the benefit received. So the ATHENIANS afterwards condened the fame Timagoras to dye, bicause he had taken bribes & money of the king of PERSIA, But Artaxerxes in recopence of so many other thinges that he had done, to despite the GRECIANS with, he did one thing that pleased them maruelously: when he did put Tisaphernes to death, who was the dreadfullest enemye the GRECIANS had. Pary/atis the Queene mother did helpe to bringe this to paffe, aggravating the accusations brought in against him. For the king kept not his anger longe against his mother, but fell in againe with her, and sent for her, knowing that she had an excellent witte and noble courage to gouerne a great kingdome: and besides, that there was nothing nowe to let them to come together as much as they would to give any occasion of iclousie or malice to any person. Some Historiographers doe write, and amongest them Heraelides of CVMBS: that Artaxerxes did not onely marie the eldest of his Daughters, but the second also called Amestri, of whome we will speake hereaster. Both the one and the other of the kings gaue credit to his wordes, either of them both miltrusting one another: so that the one speedily sent his Ambassadors vnto king Artaxerxes, with Tiribazus, and the other also his Ambassadors with his sonne. But Tiribazus tarving long in his iorney, king Artaxerxes beganne somewhat to suspect him, his enemies also did accuse him in his absence, and the king grewe very chollerycke, and repented him that he had trusted him so farre, and was willing to heare every man that spake against him. Howbeit king then thewed plainely, that cowardlines proceedeth not of pompe and curiofitie as fone. A take it belouing that it doth effeminate mens harts, but rather of a vile bale mind, that come monly followeth cuill, and the worst counsell. For nether the iewells of gold, the kingly robe. nor other fumptuous ornaments which the king euer ware about him, worth twelue thowfand talents as it is reported, did not hinder him at that tyme to travaile, and to take as much payne as any man in all his army. For he him felfe marched a foote the foremost man, cary, ing his owne truffe in a fearfe uppon his shoulders, and his target on his arme, and trauelled through highe stony mountaines. So that his fouldiers seeing the corage and payne the king. him felfetooke, they marched so nymbly, that it seemed they had wings: for he dayly marched aboue two hundred furlongs. Now the king at length by fore trauell, came to one of his owne houses, where there were goodly arbors and parkes, with goodly trees passingly sette & forth: but all the contry besides was naked and barren, so that there was not a trees great way from thence, and it was maruelous cold. The king fuffred his fouldiers to hewe downe the goodly pynes and cypres trees in his parkes; and bicaufe they durft not prefume to touch them, he him felfe as he was tooke an axe in his hande and beganne to hewe downe the goodlieft tree there. The fouldiers feeing that, fell enery man of them also to hewing: fo that in a very thort tyme they had prouided them felues well with wodde, and made them great fires in every place, and so past over the night quietly by the fires side. This notwithstanding he loft a great number of valliant men in this voyage, and almost all his horses. Therefore thinking his men would mocke him, bicause he did sayle of his purpose: he beganne to growe miffruftfull, and to fufpect the chiefest noblemen he had about him: fo that in a rage he put of many of them to death, but much more of them remayned, whome he mistrusted. For there is norming more cruell, nor a greater bloud fucker, then a cowardly tyrant: as in contrary manner nothing is more curteous, and leffe fuspicious, then a valliant and hardy man. And therefore brute beaftes that be neuer made tame nor maftered, are commonly cowardly, and timerous; and the other to the contrary, that are noble and coragious, are bold straight, and doe come to knowe a man, bicause they have no seare, nether doe they slie from their clapping and making much of them as they doe. Afterwards king Artaxerxes being growen very olde, heard that there was great sturre and contencion between his sonnes, which of them should be heire after his death, and that this contencion fell out also amonge his friends and men, of great calling. The wifeft of them wifhed, that as he him felf came vnto the crowne, as D his fathers eldest sonne: so that he likewise should after his death leaue it vnto his eldest sonne; called Darius. But the younger, which was called Ochus, being a valliant man, and of a whot ffirring nature, had some in the Court also that tooke his parte, and hoped to attayne to his purpole, by the meanes of his fifter Atoffa, whome he loued and honored, promifing to mary her, and to make her Queene, if he might come to be king after his fathers diffease. And befides, there went a report abroad, that in their fathers life time he fecretly kept her: howbeit Artaxerxes neuer vnderstoode it. Now, bicause he would betimes put his sonne Ochus out of all hope to succeede him in the kingdom, least this expectacion might make him to goe about to practife that which Cyrus did, and that by this meanes his Realme should growe into faction and civill warres: he proclaymed his eldest some Darius (beeing fiftye yeare olde) H but fonne Da. king after his death, and furthermore gaue him leave from thenceforth to weare the poynt of his hat right vp. In PERSIA the cultom is, that when any commeth to be proclaymed fucceffor and heire apparant to the crowne, he should require a gifte of him that proclay? meth him successor. The which the other doth graunt him, whatsoeuer it be that he ass keth fo it be not impossible. Darius then asked his father a concubine called Aspasia, who was first with Cyrus, & in greatest fauor with him aboue all the rest, but then was for the kings own bodye. She was borne in the contry of I on 1 A3 of free parents: and being vertuously brought vp, the was brought one night vnto Cyrus as he was at supper with other women, who sate them downe, without too curious bidding, hard by him, and were verieglad when Cyrus of fered to play and be merie with them, geuing euerie one of them some pleasaunt word, and # they made it not coy. But Aspasia stoode on her seete by the table, and sayd neuer a word: and notwithstanding that Cyrus called her, she woulde not come at him. Moreover, when one of

A the groomes of his chamber would have taken her to have brought her to him; the first faith the that layeth hands on me, thall repent it. Thereuppon all those that were present, said the was a foolish thing, and simply brought up, and could not tell what was comely for her, Howbeit Cyrus being glad of it, paffed it ouer with laughing, and told him that had brought then! vato him: doeft thou not fee, that of all these thou hast brought me, there is not an honest woman but she? After that, Cyrus began to make muche of her, and loued her better continually then all the rest, & called her Aspasia the wife. This Aspasia was taken among the spoiles of Cyrus campe after he was overthrowen, and Darius as we have told ye, did begge her of his father, who was verie angrie with it in his mind. For the barbarous people of all other things are maruelous gealous of their women, so that not onely he should be put to death, that durst B but fpeake to, or touch any concubine of the kings but in fport; but also who focuer came nere them, or neere their coches as they travelled. The kings daughter Atoffa, whom he had ma- can me ried against all lawe, was yet living, and besides her he had also three hundred and three score with rim passing fayer concubines: and yet when his some Darius asked Apassa of him, the king aunfwered, the was a free woman borne, and therefore if the woulde, he was content he should have her: but if the were vnwilling to goe to him, then he would not have him force her by no meanes. So Aspassa was sent for, and she was asked with whom she had rather be. She anfwered, with Darius: contrarie to king Artaxerxes expectacion, who both by the custome, and also the law, was compelled to let him have her. But shortly after he tooke her from him againe, faying that he woulde place her in a Nunrie of Diana, in the contrie of ECHATANRA where they call her Anitis, there to ferue the goddeffe, and to live chaft all the daies of her life: supposing by this meanes to punish his sonne, not rigorously, but moderatly, with griefe mixt with sporte and earnest. Howebeit his sonne tooke it not so pacientlie, either bicause he was deepelie in loue with Aspasia, or else for that he saw his father mocked him in that point, Tiribayus finding this, and perceiving that Darius tooke it verie grievouslie: he aggravated his anger against his father, knowing the passion of loue in Darius, by his owne, ypon the like occalion. King Artaxerxes had many daughters, and had promifed Pharnabazus one of them, confeth Decalled Apama: vnto Orontes, Rodogoune: and to Tiribazus, Amestris. The king performed the rive against other two mariages, & did put Tiribazus by his wife. For the king him felfe maried his owne bustants daughter Amestru, and for her, he promised Tiribazus the younger, Atolla: with whom also n he him selfe fell in loue, and maried her. Tiribazus hereupon was in such a rage with the king. that he hated him to the death: not bicause he was any traitor or seditious man in nature, but Tiniberus a madde harebrained fellow. For fometime he was aloft, and in as good credit and authoritie == as the best: fodainly againe he woulde play some madde parte to anger the king, and then he was in as much differace, and out of countenaunce: and could not away with neither fortune. For when he was in authoritie, he made cuerie man hate him for his pride: and being in dif-

But now befide these perswasions, the greatnes of the kingdome, and the seare Darine A. stoode in of his brother Ochus, tooke great force and effect with him and it may be also, that Venus her selfe did somewhat in the matter, for the malice and spight that Aspalia was taken from him. But what foeuer the cause was, thus was it handled: that Darius flatly conspired 2gainst his father Artaxerxes, together with Tiribazus. Now, they having gotten many conspirators to joyne with them, one of the kings Euenukes perceiuing it, ranne and told the kings of it, and howe they had sodainly determined to affaile him, knowing certainly that it was a greed among them selves, that they should kill him in his bedde in the night. Artaxerxes receiuing this aduertisement, thought it was not good to be carelesse of a matter of so great importaunce as his life: and also that it were too great lightnes in him so sodainly to beleue his Euenuke, without better proofe or knowledge. So he tooke this way with him felfe. He com- B maunded the Euenuke that had genen him this informacion to keepe companie still with the confpirators, & to follow them wherefocuer they went to fee their doings: and in the meane time he bet downe his wall behind his bed, and made a dore thorowe, and fet vp a hanging of tapistrie before it. When the time was come, as the Euenuke had aduertised the king, that the traitors ment to doe their feate: Artaxerxes being layed on his bedde, rose not vp till he had feene euerie traitor of them in the face that came to kill him. Then when he fawe them comming towards him with their fwords drawen, he fodainly lift vp the hanging, and got in to his inner chamber, & shut the dore after him, making an outcrie, murder, murder. So the traitors being plainly feene and knowen by the king, fled the fame way they came, and failed of their purpose, and bad Tiribazus saue him selse, bicause he was knowen. So they dispersed them G selues, and scaped by flying. But Tiribazus was taken tardie, although he had slaine divers of the kings gard, valliantly defending him felfe: yet they tooke him not, till he was striken with Tribasus the a dart a good way of, which flewe him. Darius was also taken and apprehended, and brought prisoner with his sonnes: and the king referred him to be judged by his peeres. For the king him felfe would not be present to gene judgement of him, but deputed others in his place to accuse him: howbeit he commaunded his secretaries to set downe in writing the opinion and fentence of euerie one of the Judges and to bring it him. In fine, they all cast him, and condemned him to dye. Then the officers layed hold on him, and brought him into a chamber of the prison, where the hangman came with a rafer in his hande with the which he vsed to cut mens throates to condemned to dye. So the hangman comming into the chamber, when he D faw it was Darius, he was affrayed, and came out of the chamber againe, his hart failing him, and durft not lay handes upon the person of the king. But the Iudges that stoode without the chamber, bad him goe and doe it, vnleffe he would have his owne throate cut. So the hangman then came in, and tooke Darius by the heare of the head, and made him hold downe his head, and so cut his necke with his rafer he had in his other hand. Others doe write, that this fentence was geuen in the presence of king Artaxerxes selfe, and that Darius seeing him felfe conuicted by manifest proofes brought in against him, he fell downe at his fathers feete, and befought him to pardon him: and then that his father being angrie, rose vp, and drew out his curtelax and wounded him in fo many places withall, that at length he flue him. Then returning into the Court, he worshipped the sunne, and turning him to his Lords that were a- E bout him, he favd vnto them. My Lordes, God be with you, and be merie at home in your houses, and tell them that were not here, how the great Oromazes hath taken reuenge of them that practifed treason against me. This was the end of Darius treason. Now Darius being dead, Ochus his brother stoode in good hope to be next heire to the crowne, & the rather, through the meanes and frendshippe of his sister Atossa: but yet of his legitimate brethren, he seared him called Ariaspes, who was onely left of all the rest that were legitimate: and of his bastard xerxes somes brethren Arsames:not bicause Ariaspes was elder than he, but for that he was of a fost & plaine nature, the Persians defired he might be their king. On the other fide, Arfames was wife, and valliant: and Ochus fawe that his father loued him dearely. So he determined to intrappe them both. Now Ochus being a futtle and malicious natured man, he first shewed his crueltie vpon Arlames, and his malice vpon Ariales his legitimate brother. For, bicause he knewe he was but simple and plaine, he sent dayly some of the kings Euenukes vnto him, who brought

A him threatning words and meffages, as from the king: telling him that he had determined to put him to a shamefull and cruel death, So, forging these newes continuallie as things verie fecret, they did to terrific poore Arialbes, telling him that the king was fullie bent to put fome of his threats in execution out of hand: that he was put in such feare and dispaire of his life, that he prepared him felfe apoylon, and dranke it, to ridde him felfe of his life. King Artaxermer understanding of his death, tooke it very heavily, & began to mistrust the cause that made him to make him felfe away: howebeit he coulde not feeke the proofe of it. for his extreame age. But this chaunce made him loue Arfames better then before, thewing plainly that he trufred him better then Ochus, and did make him privile to all things. Ochus could no lenger abide to deferre his intent, and therefore entifed Harpaces, Tiribazus sonne, to kill his bastard bro-B ther Arfames : the which he did. Now Artaxerxes was so extreame older that he was as good The deeth of as done with age; but after he heard his fonne Arlames was murdered, he coulde beare it no king Analenger, but tooke it so to his hart for sorow, that when he had lived source score and sourceene xerxes. veares, and raigned three score and two, he dyed. When he was dead, they then found that he had bene a gratious & curteous Prince, and one that loued his people and subjectes: when olde at his they faw the proofe of his fuccessor Ochus, that passed all men liuing, in crueltie and severity.

gether, the one a straunger of the citie of LOCRES, called Doride: and the other of the contry it selfe, called Aristomaché, the daughter of Hipparinus the chiefest man of all Syracvs a, and machi, of Sy- that had bene companion with Dionylius, the first time he was chosen Generall. It was fayd that Dionylius maried them both in one day, and that they could never tell which of them he knewe first: but otherwise, that he made as much of the one, as he did of the other. For they commonly fate together with him at his table, and did either of them lye with him by turnes: though the Syrac vsans would have their owne contrywoman preferred before the straunger. Howebeit the straunge woman had this good happe, to bring foorth Dionysius his eldest sonne, which was a good countenaunce to defend her, being a forreiner. Aristomache in contrarie maner, continued a long time with Dionysius, without frute of her wombe, although he E was verie defirous to haue children by her: fo that he put the Locaian womans mother to death, accusing her that she had with forceries and witchcrast, kept Aristomaché from being with child. Dion being the brother of Aristomache, was had in great estimation at the first, for his fifters fake: but afterwards the tyran finding him to be a wife man, he loued him the for his owne sake. Infomuch, that among many fundrie things & pleasures he did for him: he commaunded his Treasorers to let him have what money he asked of them, so they made him acquainted withall the felfe fame day they gave him any. Nowe though Dion had ever before 2 noble minde in him by nature, yet muche more did that magnanimitie increase, when Plato by good fortune arrived in Sicile. For his comming thither furelie was no mans deuile, as I take it; but the verie pronidence of fome god: who (bringing farre of the first beginning F and fundation of the libertic of the Syrac vsans, and to overthrow the tyrannicall state) sent Plate out of LTALIE vnto the citie of SYRACVSA, and brought him acquainted with Dien, who

A was but a young man at that time, but yet had an apter witte to learne, and redier good will to Dion, Plaine follow vertue, then any young man elfe that followed Plato: as Plato him felfe writeth, and his feholler. owne doinges also doe witnesse. For Dion having from a child bene brought up with humble conditions vnder a tyran, and acquainted with a fernile timerous life, with a prowde and infolent reigne, with all vanity and curiofitie, as placing chiefe felicity in couetouines: neuerthelesse, after he had felt the sweete reasons of Philosophie, teaching the broad way to vertue, his hart was enflamed straight with earnest desire to follow the same. And bicause he found that he was so easelie perswaded to loue vertue and honestie, he simplie thinking (being of an honest plaine nature) that the selfe same perswasions would moue a like affection in Dionysius: obteined of Diony fius, that being at leafure, he was contented to fee Plato, and to fpeake with him. B When Plato came to Dionysius, all their talke in maner was of vertue, and they chiefely reaso-Plato and ned what was fortitude: where Plato proued that tyrans were no valliant men. From thence passing further into inflice, he told him that the life of inst men was happy, and contrarily the guber, life of vniust men vnfortunate. Thus the tyran Dionysius perceiuing he was ouercomen, durst no more abide him, and was angrie to fee the standers by to make suche estimacion of Plato, and that they had fuch delight to heare him speake. At length he angrily asked him, what bufinesse he had to doe there? Plato aunswered him, he came to seeke a good man. Dionysius then replied againe: what, in Gods name, by thy speache then it seemeth thou hast founde none yet. Now Dion thought that Dionysius anger would proceede no further, and therefore at Platoes earnest request, he sent him away in a galley with three bankes of owers, the which C. Pollis a LACED EMONIAN Captaine caried backe againe into GRECE. Howbeit Dionylius fecretlie requested Pollis to kill Plato by the way, as ouer he would doe him pleasure : if not, yet Diomfine that he would fell him for a flaue, how soeuer he did. For faid he, he shall be nothing the worse malice vinto for that: bicause if he be a iust man, he shall be as happie to be a slaue, as a freeman. Thus, as it is reported, this Pollis caried Plato into the Ile of AGINA, and there fold him. For the AGI- Plato folde in NETES having warre at that time with the ATHENIANS, made a decree, that all the ATHE- the ile of NIANS that were taken in their Ile, should be fold. This notwithstanding, Dionysius refused not to honor and trust Dion, as much as euer he did before, and did also sende him Ambassador in matters of great weight. As when he fent him vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, where he behaued him felfe fo well, that he wan great reputation by his iorney: and the tyran coulde well away Diene hold. D with his plaine speach. For no man but he, durst fay their mindes so boldly vnto him, to speake nes in speawhat he thought good: as on a time he reproued him for Gelon. One day when they mocked king plainty Gelons gouernment before the tyrans face, and that Dionysius him selfe sayd (finely deskanting Gelon figniof his name, which fignifieth laughture) that he was euen the verie laughing stockehim selfe fieth laughture of Sicilia: the Courtiers made as though they liked this encounter and interpretacion of laughture paffingly well. But Dion not being well pleased withall, sayd vnto him: for his sake, men trusted thee, whereby thou camest to be tyran: but for thine owne sake they will neuer trust any man. For to say truly, Gelon shewed by his gouernment, that it was as goodly a thing as coulde be, to see a citie gouerned by an absolute Prince: but Dionysius by his gouernment on thother fide, made it appeare as detestable a thing. This Dionysius had by his LOCRIAN E wife three children, and by Aristomaché foure: of the which, two were daughters, the one cal- sophrofini led Sophrofyne, and the other Arete. Of them, Dionysius eldest sonne maried Sophrofyne, and A- and Arete. rete was maried vnto his brother Thearides, after whose death Dion maried her, being his the daughten Nece. Now when Dionysius her father fell sicke, not likely to escape: Dion would have spoken by Arifford with him for his children he had by his fifter Aristomache. Howbeit the Phistitions about him, Dion marish to currie fauor with the next heire and successor of the tyrannie, would neuer let him haue a- his Nece A. ny time or oportunitie to speake with him. For, as Timaus writeth, they gaue Dionyfius the el- ruishe der (as he had commaunded them) a strong opiat drinke to cast him in a sleepe, and so thereby they tooke from him all his sences and joyned death with his sleepe. Notwithstanding, in of his sign

But he made them most to wonder at him, when they fearing about all other thinges, the daunger Dionylius state was in, by reason of CARTHAGE, he did promise them, that if Diongfius would have peace, he would then goe foorthwith into AFRICKE, and finde the meanes honorablie to quenche the warres: or if otherwise he better liked of warre, that he woulde furnishe him at his owne proper costes and charges, fiftie gallies readie to rowe. Dionyline wondered greatlie at the noble minde of Dion, and thanked him muche for the good will he bare vnto him, touching his estate. But all men else taking Dions noble offer to be a reproach of their auarice, and his credit and authoritie, and impaire vnto theirs: they presentlie vpon this liberall offer tooke occasion to accuse him, not sparing any reproachefull wordes against him, to moue Dionysius to be offended with him. For they complayned of him, and fayd that I he cuminglie practifed to possesse the tyrannie, making him selfe strong by sea, going about by his gallies to make the tyrannie fall into the handes of the children of driftomache his fifter. But the chiefest cause of all why they did malice and hate him, was his straunge manner of life: that he neither woulde keepe companie with them, nor line after their manner. For they that from the beginning were crept in fauour and frendshippe with this younge euill brought up tyranne, by flattering of him, and feeding him with vaine pleasures: studied for no other thing, but to enterteine him in loue matters, and other vaine exercises, as to riot and bancket, to keepe light women companie, and all fuche other vile vicious pastimes and recreacions, by the which the tyrannie became like iron foftened by fire, and feemed to be verie pleasaunt vnto the subjectes, bicause the ouergreat Maiestie and seueritie thereof was fomewhat milder, not fo muche by the bountie and goodnesse, as by the follie and rechlesnes of the Lorde. Thus, this litle care and regarde increasing more and more, still winning way with the young tyran: did at length melt and breake a funder those strong diamond chaines, with the whiche Dionysius the elder made his boast that he left his Monarchie and tyrannie chained to his fonne. For fometime he would be three dayes together without intermiffion, still banketing and being dronke: and all that time his Court gates were kept shut vnto graue and wife men, and for all honest matters, and was then full of dronkards, of common playes, dauncinges, maskes, and mommeries, and full of all fuche tromperie and diffolute pattimes. And therefore Dion vindoubtedlie was much enuied of them, bicause he gaue him selfe to no sport nor pleasure: whereupon they accused him, and missamed his vertues, vices, being D formwhat to be refembled vnto them. As in calling his grauetie, pride: his plainnes and boldnesse in his Oration, obstinacie: if he did perswade them, that he accused them: and bicause he would not make one in their fonde pastimes: that therefore he despised them. For to say truelie, his manners by nature had a certeine hawtinesse of mindeand seueritie, and he was a ners, soo grave fower man to be acquainted with: whereby his companie was not onely troublesome, but alfo unplefaunt to this younger Dionylius, whose eares were so fine, that they could not away to heare any other thing but flatterie. And furthermore, diuers of his verie frendes and familiars, that did like and commend his plaine manner of speache and noble minde: they did yet reprough his sternenes, and austere conversation with men. For it seemed vnto them, that he spake too roughlie, and delt ouerhardlie with them that had to doe with him, and more then became a civill or curteous man. And for proofe hereof, Plato him selfe sometime wrote vnto him (as if he had prophecied what shoulde happen) that he should beware of obstinacie, the companion of folitarinesse, that bringeth a man in the ende to be forsaken of euerie one. This notwithstanding, they did more reuerence him at that time, then any man else: bicause of the state and gouernment, and for that they thought him the onely man that coulde best prouide for the lafetie and quietnesse of the tyrannie, the which stoode then in tickle state. Now Dion knew well enough, that he was not fo well taken and efteemed through the good will of the tyran, as against his will, and for the necessitie of the state and time. So Dion suppoling that ignoraunce, and want of knowledge in Dionylius was the cause: he deuised to put him into some honest trade or exercise, and to teache him the liberall sciences, to frame him I to a civil life, that thencefoorth he shoulde no more be affrayed of vertue, and shoulde also take pleasure and delight in honest thinges. For Diomsius of his owne nature, was none of the worst fort of tyrans, but his father feating that if he came once to have a feeling and conceite of him felfe, or that he companied with wife and learned men, he would go neere to enter into practife, and put him out of his feate: he euer kept him locked up in a chamber, and woulde fuffer no man to speake with him. Then the younger Dionystus having nothing else to do, gaue himselse to make little chariots, candlesticks, chaires, stooles, and tables of worde. For his father Dionyfus was fo fearefull and mistrustfull of eueric bodie, that he woulde suffer no Dionyfus et man with a paire of barbers fiffers to polle the heares of his head, but caused an image maker elder, a manof earth to come vnto him, and with a hotte burning cole to burne his goodly buth of heare round fulfill rounde about. No man came into his chamber where he was, with a gowne on his backe, no would not his owne brother nor fonne, but he was driven before he coulde come in, to put of his B gowne, and the garde of his chamber to strippe him naked what so ever he was : and then they gaue him an other gowne to call voon him, but not his owne. One day his brother Leptines. going about to describe vnto him the scituacion of some place, he tooke a halberd from one of the garde, and with the point thereof beganne to drawe out a platte of the same vpon the ground. Dionylius was terriblic offended with him, and did put the fouldier to death that gaue him his halberd. He sayed he was affrayed of his frendes, yea and of the wifest of them; bicause he knewe that they desired rather to rule, then to be ruled, and to commaunde, then to obey. He flewe one of his Captaines called Marfras, whome he had preferred, and had geuen him charge of men: bicause he dreamed that he killed him: saying that he dreamed of pionsing this in the night, bicause that waking in the day he had determined to kill him. Now Dionvilus in c that was fo timerous, and whose mind through searcfulnes was still miserablic occupied: he was not with standing maruelouslie offended with Plato, bicause he did not judge him to be the noblest and valliantest man aliue. Dion therefore seeing (as we have sayd) the younger Diowyfius cleane marred, and in manner cast away for lacke of good education: perswaded him the best he coulde to geue him selse vnto studie, and by the greatest intreatie he coulde possiblie make, to pray the Prince of all Philosophers to come into Sicilia. And then when Dinterfee through his intreatie he were come, that he woulde referre him selfe whollie vnto him, to deab the thende that reforming his life by vertue and learning, and knowing God thereby : (the best younger Die example that can be possible, and by whom all the whole world is ruled and gouerned, which is suggested otherwise were out of all order and confused) he shoulde first obteine great happines to him D felfe, and confequently vnto all his citizens alfo, who euer after through the temperance and inflice of a father, would with good will doe those thinges, which they presentlie vnwillingly did for the feare of a Lorde, and in doing this, from a tyran he should come to be a king. For, the chaines of a diamant to keepe a realme in safetie, were not force, and feare, as his father The affined Dionysius helde opinion: neither the great multitude of young fouldiers, nor the garde of ten said of Print thowfand barbarous people: but in contrarie manner, that they were the loue and good will of their false. of their fubiectes, which the Prince obteineth through vertue and iustice: the which chaines with though they be flacker then the other that are so hard and stiffe, yet are they stronger, and will last longer time, to keepe a realme and kingdom in safetie. And furthermore, the Prince (sayd he) is not defirous of honor, neither is a man that descrueth greatly to be praised and com-F mended, that onely studieth to weare sumptuous apparell, and that glorieth to see his Court richelie furnished, and him selse curiouslie serued : and in the meane time doth not frame him felfe to speake better, to be wifer, and to carie a greater maiesty then any other meane or common person, not esteeming to adorne and beawtifie the Princely pallace of his minde, as becommeth the royall maieftie of a king. Dion oftentimes rehearling these exhortacions vnto Diony fine, and otherwhile enterlacing betwene, some reasons he had learned of Piato: he graffed in him a wonderfull, and as it were a vehement defire to have Plato in his companie, and to learne of him. So fundry letters came from Dionysius vnto Athans, divers requestes from Dion, and great intreaty made by certaine Pythagorian Philosophers, that prayed and perswaded Plato to come into Sicile, to bridle the light disposition of this young man, by his grave and wife instructions: who without regard of reason, led a dissolute and licentious life. Therefore Plato, as him felfe reporteth, blushing to him felfe, and fearing least he should gene men teach Dian willing to do any worthie act: and further, hoping that doing good but vnto one man alone, A who was the only guide of all the rest, he should as it were recoursall Sicilia from her corruption and fickenes: he performed their requests that fent vnto him. But Dions enemies fearing the change and alteracion of Dionylius, they perfwaded him to call Philifus the Hiftoriographer home againe from banishment, who was a learned man, and had bene brought vp. and acquainted with the tyrans facions : to thend he should ferue as a counterpeace, to withstande Plate and his Philosophie. For this Philistus, from the first time that the tyrannie beganne to be established, did shew him selfe verie willing and conformable to the stablishment thereof, and had of long time kept the castell: and the voyce went, that he kept the mother of Dionysius the elder, and as it was supposed, not altogether without the tyrans knowledge. But afterwardes, Leptines having had two daughters by one woman, whom he intifed to fol- B lie being an other mans wife: he maried one of these his daughters vnto Philistus, and made not Dionysius privile to it before. The tyranne therewith was so offended, that he put Leptines woman in prison fast locked vp, and draue Philistus out of Sicilia. He being banished thus, repayred vnto some of his frendes that dwelt about the Adriaticke sea, where it seeand of Sicilia, meth he wrote the most parte of all his historie, being then at good leasure. For he was not called home againe during the life of Dionylius the elder: but after his death, the malice the Courtiers have vnto Dion, caused them to procure Philistus calling home againe, as we have told you, as the man they thought would flicke flowtly in defense of the tyranny. So Philistus no fooner returned but he flowtly began to defend the tyranny: & others in contrary maner, denifed accusations to the tyran against Dion, accusing him that he had practifed with Theo- C dotes and Heraclides, to querthrowe the tyrannie of Dionylius, For Dion, in my opinion, hoped by Platoes comming to bridle and leffen a litle the ouerlicentious and imperious tyrannie of Dionysius, and thereby to frame Dionysius a wise and righteous governor. But on the other side, if he saw he would not follow his counsell, and that he yeelded not to his wise instructions: he then determined to put him downe, & to bring the gouernment of the common wealth into the handes of the Syrac vsans: not that he allowed of Democratia (to wit, where the people gouerne)but yet certainly thinking that Democratia was much better then the tyrannie, when they could not come vnto Ariflocratia, to wit, the gouernment of a few of the nobilitie. Now prople, they could not come vinto Artipute arises of the sum of the sum allowed things being in this state, Plato arrived in Sicile, where he was maruelously received and home things being in this state, Plato arrived in Sicile, where he was maruelously received and home things being in this state, Plato arrived in Sicile, where he was maruelously received and home the sum of the su nored by Dionysius. For when he landed on the shoare, leaving his galley that brought him: D there was readie for him one of the kings rich and sumptuous chariots to conuey him to the castell: and the tyran made facrifice to geue the goddes thankes for his comming, as for some wonderful great good happe chaunced vnto his feigniory. Furthermore, the wonderfull modestie and temperaunce that was begon to be observed in feasts and bankets, the Court cleane chaunged, and the great goodnes and clemencie of the tyran in all thinges, in ministring iustice to euerie man: did put the Syrac v sans in great good hope of chaunge, and euerie man in the Court was verie defirous to geue him felfe to learning and Philosophie. So that, as men reported, the tyrannes pallace was full of fande and dust, with the numbers of stuof Dientfin, dentes that drewe plattes and figures of Geometrie. Shortlie after Plato was arrived, by chaunce the time was comen about to doe a solemne sacrifice within the castell, at whiche facrifice the Heraulde (as the manner was) proclaimed alowde the folemne prayer accuflomed to be done, that it woulde please the goddes long to preserue the state of the tyrannie: and that Dionylius being harde by him, fayd vnto him, what, wilt thou not leaue to curfe me? This worde grieued Philifts and his companions to the harte, thinkinge that with time, by litle and litle, Plato woulde winne fuche estimacion and greate authoritie with Diomylius, that afterwardes they shoulde not be able to resist him: considering that in so short a time as he had bene with Dionysius, he had so altered his minde and courage. And there-Philifian ac. fore they nowe beganne, not one by one, nor in hugger mugger, but all of them with open mowth together to accuse Dion: and sayed, that it was easie to be seene, howe he charmed and inchaunted Dionysius through Platoes eloquence, to make him willing to refigne his gouernment, bicause he woulde transferre it to the handes of the children of his sister Aristomaché. Others seemed to be offended, for that the ATHENIANS having comen before into

A Sicilia with a great armie, both by fea and land, they were all loft and caft away, and could not win the city of Syracvsa: & that now by one only Sophifter, they vtterly destroyed and ouerthrewe the Empire of Dionysius, perswading him to discharge the ten thowsand souldiers he had about him for his garde, to forfake the foure hundred gallies, the ten thowfand horfemen, and as many moe footemen, to goe to the Academy to feeke an vnknowen happines neuer heard of before, and to make him happy by Geometry, refigning his prefent happines and felicitie to be a great Lord, to haue money at will, and to liue pleafauntlie, vnto Dion and his Neuewes. By fuch like accusarions and wicked tongues, Dionysius began first to mistrust Dion, and afterwardes to be openly offended with him, and to frowne vpon him. In the meane time they brought letters Dion wrote fecretlie vnto the Gouernors of the citie of CARTHAGE, Wil- Dion letters

B ling them that when they would make peace with Dionysius, they shoulde not talke with him who care vnleffe he stoode by: affuring them that he would helpe them to fet things in quietnes, & that the second s all should be well againe. When Dionysius had red these letters with Philistus, & had taken his aduise & counsel what he should do, as Times said the deceived Dion under pretence of recociliació, making as though he ment him no hurt, & faying that he would become frends again with him. So he brought Dion one day to the fea fide under his castell, and shewed him these letters, burdening him to have practifed with the CARTHAGINIANS against him. And as Dion went about to make him answere, to cleere himself: Dionysius would not heare him, but caused him to be taken vp as he was, and put into a pinnafe, & commaunded the mariners to fet him a lande voon the coast of ITALIE. After this was done, and that it was known abroad in the Dion fent de

C citie, euerie man thought it a cruell parte of Dionysius: insomuche that the tyrans pallacewas way by Dioin a maruelous pecke of troubles, for the great forowe the women made for the departure of tale. Dion. Moreover, the citie selfe of Syracvsa began to looke about them, looking for some fodaine great chaunge & innouation, for the tumult & vprore that would happen by meanes of Dions banishment, and for the mistrust also that all men would have of Dionysius. Dionysius. confidering this, and being affrayed of some misfortune, he gaue his frendes and the women of his pallace comfortable words, telling them that he had not banished him, but was contonted that he should absent him selfe for a time: being affrayed, that in his sodaine angry modds he might peraduenture be compelled to do him some worse turne if he remained, bigause of his obstinacie and selfewill. Furthermore, he gaue vnto Dions frends two shippes, to carious D much goodes, money, and as many of Dions feruauntes as they woulde, and to convey them vnto him vnto Peloponnes vs. Dion was a maruelous rich man, & for the pompe of his fer, Dion wealth uice, and sumptuous moueables of his house, they were like vnto the person of a syradio All these riches Dions frendes brought abord vpon those shippes, and carried them vnto him, the fides many other rich gifts, which the women and his frends fent vnto him. So that by meanes of his great riches, Dion was maruelouslie esteemed among the GRECIANS: who by the tiches of a banished citizen, coniectured what the power of a tyranne might be. But now concerning Plato: when Dion was exiled, Dionysius caused him to be lodged in his castell, and by this meanes craftilie placed, under cloke of frendshippe, an honorable garde about him; bicause he shoulde not returne into GRECE to seeke Dion, to tell him of the injurie he had shoe E vnto him. Howbeit Dionysius often frequenting his companie, (as a wilde beast is made tame by companie of man) he liked his talke fo well, that he became in loue with him, but it was a tvrannicall loue. For he woulde haue Plato to loue none but him, and that he shoulde e- DANNING. fleeme him aboue all men liuing, being readie to put the whole realme into his handes; and ramifall has all his forces: fo that he woulde thinke better of him, then of Dion. Thus was this passionate "Thinke affection of Dionysius grieuous vnto Plato. For he was so drowned with the love of him, as men extreamelie gealous of the women they loue: that in a moment he woulde fod ainly fall out with him, and straight againe become frendes, and pray him to pardon him. And to say truelie, he had a maruelous desire to heare Platoes Philosophie: but on the other side, thereuerenced them that did diffwade him from it, and told him that he woulde spoyle him felfe.

if he entred ouerdeepelie into it. In the meane time fell out warre, and thereupponhe fent Plato againe away, promifing him that the next fpring he woulde fende for Dion home. But Dionghia he brake promise therein, and yet sent him his reuenues: and prayed Plato to pardon him, from bing, from bing, SSSS ii though he had not kept promise at his time appointed. For he alleaged the warre was the A cause, and that so some as he had ended his warre, he woulde sende for Dion: whome in the meane time he prayed to have pacience and not to attempt any sturre or alteracion against him, nor to speake cuill of him among the GRECIANS. This Plato sought to bring to passe, and brought Dien to studie Philosophie, and kept him in the Academy at Athens. Dien lay in the citie of ATHENS with one Callippus, whome he had known of long time, howbeit he bought him a house in the contrie, to lye there sometime for his pleasure, the which he gaue afterwards(at his returne into Sicilia)vnto Speufippus that kept him company, and was continually with him, more then with any other frend he had in ATHENS, through Platoes counfell: who to fosten and recreate Dions maners, gaue him the company of some pleasaunt conceited man, knowing that this Speulippus coulde modeltlie observe time and place to be plea- B faunt and merie: for which respect, Timon in his Satyricall leasts, calleth Spensippus a good leafter. Nowe Plato him felfe having vndertaken to defray the charges of common playes in the dauncings of young children: Dion tooke the paines to teache and exercise them, and moreouer was him felfe at the whole charge of these playes, Plato suffering him to bestowe that liberality and curtesie vpon the Athenians: the which wanne Dion a great deale more good will, then Plato honor. Dion kept not still at Athens, but went also to see the other good cities of GRECE, passing his time away. He being at common feastes and assemblies with the chiefest men, and best learned in matters of state and gouernment, & neuer shewing any light partes, nor signe of tyrannicall pride in his maner of life, nor of a man that had bene brought vp with all pompe and pleasure, but like a graue vertuous man, and well studied in Philoso- C phie, whereby he grew to be generallie beloued and effeemed of all men: the cities graunted him publike honors, and fent him decrees of his glorie, made in their counsells & affemblies. Furthermore, the LACED & MONIANS made him a Spart an & burges of the city, not passing for Dionysius displeasure, though at that time he had genen them great aide, in the warre they made against the THEBANS, Some report, that Dion on a time was intreated by Pt. addorus MEby the Gra-GARTAN, to come and see him at his house: and Dion went thither. This Ptaodorus was a maruelous great rich man, & therefore Dion feeing a great number of people standing at his gares, and that it was a hard thing to come and speake with him he had such great busines: he turned vnto his frends that did accompanie him, who were angrie they made him tarie fo long at the gate, and fayd vnto them: what cause have we to thinke euill of him, sith we did the like when D we were at Syrac vs a? But Dionysius being incensed with enuie against him, and searing the good will the GR ECIANS bare him: he kept backe his reuenue, and would no more sende it him, and feafed all his goodes, the which he gaue to his receivers to keepe. Furthermore, bicause he woulde cleere him selse of the infamie he had gotten amongest the Philosophers for Platoes sake, he sent for divers wife and learned men, and vainly covering to excell them all in wisedome, he was driven improperlie, and out of time, to alleage many wise sayinges he had learned of Plato. Thereuppon he beganne againe to with for him, and to condemne him felfe, for that he had no wit to vie him well when he had him at his commaundement, and that he had not heard so muche as he should have done of him: and like a tyranne as he was, madlie caried away with light defires, and eafilie channging minde from time to time, a sodaine ve- E hement desire tooke him in the heade, to have Plato againe. So he sought all the meanes and waies he could deuise, to pray Archytas the Pythagorian Philosopher to tel him, that he might boldly come, and to be his furery vnto him for that he would promile him : for first of all, they were acquainted together by his meanes. Therefore Archytas fent thither Archidamus the Philosopher. Dionysius also sent certeine gallies, and some of his frendes thither, to pray Plato to come to him: and he him felfe wrote speciallie, and plainly, that it should not goe well with Dion, if Plato came not into Sicilia: but if he woulde be perswaded to come, that then he would doe what he would have him. Many letters and requests came vnto Dion from his wife and fifter, infomuche as Dion fo vied the matter, that Plato obeyed Dionyfius, without making any excuse at all. So Plato wryteth him selfe, that he was driven to come againe the third time Plates third into the straight of Sicilia:

Now

Nowe Plato being arrived in Sicilia, he made Dionysius a greatioyfull man, and filled all Sicilia againe with great good hope: for they were all verie desirous, and did what they could, to make Plato ouercome Philistus and the tyrannie, with his Philosophie, The women of Dionysius Court did entertaine Plato the best they could: but aboue all, Dionysius seemed to haue a maruelous trust and affiance in him, and more then in any other of all his frendes. For he suffred Plato to come to him without searching of him, and oftentimes offred to geue him a great fumme of money: but Plato would take none of it. Therefore Ariftippus CYRENIAN being at that time in the tyrannes Court in Sicilia, fayd that Dionylius bestowed his liberalitie surelie. For, to vs that aske much he geneth litle, and much vnto Plato that requireth no- Ariffippus thing. After Dionysius had geuen Plato his welcome, he beganne to moue him againe of Dion. Saying B Dionysius on the other side, at the first did vse him with fine delayes, but afterwards he shewed Dionysius. him selfe angrie in deede: and at length fell out with Plato, but yet so couertlie, that others faw it not. For Dionylius diffembled that, and otherwise in all other things he did him as much honor as he could deuife, practifing thereby to make him to forfake Dions frendshippe. Now

Plato found him at the first, that there was no trust to be genen to his wordes, and that all were but lyes and deuises he either sayd or did: howebeit he kept it to him selfe, and ever paciently bare all things, hoping for the best, and made as though he beleued him. They two thus finelie diffembling with eache other, thinking to deceive all men, and that none shoulde understande their secrets : Helycon CYZICENIAN, one of Platoes frendes, did prognosticate the e- Helycon A clipse of the funne. The same falling out as he had prognosticated, the tyran esteemed mar- Mathemati-

C uelously of him, and gaue him a filuer talent for his labor. Then Aristippus sporting with other cion. Philosophers, sayd he could tell them of a straunger thing to happen then that. So when they prayed him to tell them what it was: I do prognosticate, sayd he, that Plato and Dionysius will Arisippus be enemies ere it be long. In thend it came to passe, that Dionysius made porte sale of all Dions dimination. goodes, and kept the money to him felfe, and lodged Plato that before lay the next Court to his pallace, among the fouldiers of his gard, whom he knewe maliced him of long time, and fought to kill him: bicause he did perswade Dionysius to leave his tyranny and to live without his gard. Plato being in this instant daunger, Archytas sent Ambassadors foorthwith vnto Dio- Architas remyfine, in a galley of thirtie owers, to demaund Plato againe : declaring that Plato came againe quireth Plato to Syracvsa, vppon his worde and caution. Dionysius to excuse him selfe, and to shewe that find D he was not angrie with him at his departure from him: he made him all the great cheere and feastes he coulde, and so sent him home with great shewes of good will. One day among the rest, he sayd vnto Plato: I am affrayed Plato, sayd he, that thou wilt speake cuill of me, when thou are among thy frendes and companions in the Academy. Then Plato finiling, aunfwered him againe: the goddes forbidde that they shoulde have suche scarcetie of matter in the Academy, as that they must needes talke of thee. Thus was Platoes returne, as it is reported, although that which he him selfe wryteth agreeth not much with this reporte. These things went to Dions harte, fo that shortly after he shewed him selfe an open enemie vnto Dionysius, but specially when he heard how he had handled his wife, Plate under couert words, sent Dienysius worde of it by his letters. And thus it was. After Dion was exiled Dionysius returning Dionysius

E Plato backe againe, he willed him fecretlie to feele Dions minde, whether he woulde not be maried Dione angrie that his wife should be maried to an other man: bicause there ranne a rumor abroade wife to an o-(whether it were true, or invented by Dions enemies) that he liked not his mariage, and coulde not live quietlie with his wife. Therefore when Plato was at ATHENS, and had tolde Dion of all thinges, he wrote a letter vnto Dionysius the tyranne, and did sette all other thinges downe so plainelie, that euerie man might vnderstande him, but this one thing only so darkelie, that he alone, and none other coulde vnderstande him, but him to whom he had wrytten: declaring vnto him, that he had spoken with Dion about the matter he wote of, and that he did lette him vnderstande he woulde be maruelous angrie, if Diomfine did it. So at that time, bicause there was great hope of reconciliacion betwene them, the tyranne did no-F thing latelie touching his fifter, but luffered her still to remaine with Dions sonne. But when they were fo farre out, that there was no more hope to returne in fauour againe, and that he had also sent home Plato in disgrace and displeasure: then he maried his fifter Arete SSSS iii

(Dions wife) against her will, vnto one of his frends called Timocrates, not following therin his fathers inflice and lenitie. For Polyxenus that had maried his fathers fifter Thesta, being also become his enemie: he fled out of Sicilia. Dionysius the elder sent for his sister Thesia, and tooke her vp verie sharpely, for that she knowing her husbande would flie, she did not come and tell him of it. Thesta noblie aunswered him againe, and neuer was affrayed nor abashed: why, Dionylius, doest thou thinke me a woman so faint harted and beastlie, that if I had knowen my husband would haue gone his way, and left me: that I would not haue taken the fea with him, and both haue runne one fortune together? Truely I knew not of his departure till he was gone: for it had bene more for mine honor to haue bene called the wife of the banifined Polyxenus, then the fifter of thee a tyran. Dionylius maruelled to heare his fifter speake thus boldly, and the Syracvsans wondred at her noble corage: infomuch that when the tyran-B nie was vtterly destroyed, they did not refuse to doe her all the honor they could deuise, as vnto a Queene. And when the was deade also, all the citizens of Syrac vsa by a common decree, did accompanie her bodie at her buriall. This litle digression from our historie, is not altogether vnprofitable. But now againe to our matter. Dion from thenceforth disposed him felfe altogether vnto warre, against Platoes counsell and aduise: who did his best endeuour to diffivade him from it, both for the respect of Dionysius good enterteinment he had geuen him, as also for that Dion was of great yeares. Howbeit on the other side, Speusippus, and his other frendes did prouoke him vnto it, and did perswade him to deliuer Sicilia from the sauerie and bondage of the tyran, the which helde vp her handes vnto him, and woulde receive him with great loue and good will. For whilest Plato lay at Syracvsa, Speulippus keeping the ci- C tizens companie more then Plato did, he knew their minds better then he. For at the first they were affrayed to open them selues vnto him, and frankelie to speake what they thought, mistrusting he was a spie vnto the tyran, sent amongest them to feele their mindes: but within a short time they beganne to trust him, and were all of one minde, for they prayed and perswaded Dion to come, and not to care otherwise for bringing of shippes, souldiers, nor horses with him, but onely to hyre a shippe, and to lend the Sicilians his bodie and name against Dionysius. Speusippus reporting these newes vnto Dion, did put him in good hart againe: wherupon he began fecretly to leauie men by other mens meanes, to hide his purpose and intent. The Philosophers doe set forward Dions warres. Many citizens dealing in the affaires of the phers advan- common wealth did aide him, and divers of them also that onely gave their mindes to the D studie of Philosophie : and among them, Eudemus CYPRIAN (on whose death Aristotle wrote his dialogue of the foule) and Timonides LEVCADIAN WERE with him. Furthermore, there ioyned also with him Miltas THESSALIAN, a Soothfayer, and that had bene his companion in studie in the Academy. Nowe of all them whom the tyran had banished, (which were no leffe then a thowfande persons) there were but onely fiue and twentie that durst accompanie him in this warre. For all the other were suche dastardes, that they for fooke him, and durst not goe with him. The place where they appointed to meete, was the Ile of ZACYNTHS. where they leavied all their fouldiers, that were not about eight hundred in all, but all of them braue fouldiers, and valliant men, and excellentlie well trained in warres: and to conclude, such lustie men, as would incorage all the armie Dion hoped of at his ariuall in Sicile, E to fight like valliant men with them. These hyered fouldiers, the first time that they vnderstoode it was to go into Sicilia, to make warre with Dionysus: they were amased at the first, and milliked the iorney, bicause it was vndertaken rather of malice and spite that Dion had to be reuenged, then otherwise of any good cause or quarrell, who having no better hope, tooke vppon him desperate and impossible enterprises. Therefore the fouldiers were offended with their Captaines that had pressed them, bicause they had not told them of this warre before But after that Dion by a notable Oration had told them, how tyrannies have euill fundacions & are subject vnto ruine, & that he led them not into Sicilia so much for souldiers, as he did to make the Captaines of the Syracysans, & the other Sicilians, who of long time defired nothing more then occasion to rise. And, when after him also Alcimenes, (acopanion with p him in this warre, and the chiefest man of all the ACHAIANS, both for nobility & estimacion) did speake vnto them in like maner, then they were all contented to goe whether they would

A lead them. It was then in the hart of sommer, and the wind blew called the GR ECIAN winds the Moone being at the full, and Dion having prepared to make a fumptuous facrifice vnto the god Apollo, he led all his men armed with white corfelets in procession into the templer and after the facrifice done, he made them a feast in the parke or shewe place of the ZACYN-THIANS. There the tables were layed, and the fouldiers wondred to fee the great state & magnificence of the great number of pots of gold and filuer, and fuch other furniture and preparation, as passed a private mans wealth: then they thought with them selves, that a man be feeling. ing so olde, and Lord of so great a good, would not attempt things of such daunger, without good ground, and great affurance of his friends ayde & helpe. But after his oblations of wine, and common prayers made to the gods at feasts: sodainly the Moone eclipsed, Dion thought The eclipses B it not straunge to see an eclipse, considering the revolutions of the eclipses, and knowing ve- the Moone, ry well it is a shadowe that falleth vpon the body of the Moone, bicause of the direct inter- and cause position of the earth betwixt her and the Sunne. But bicause the souldiers that were affravd of the science. and aftonied withall, floode in neede of fome comfort and encoragement: Miltas the Soothfaver standing up in the middest amongest them, sayd unto them. My fellowe souldiers, be of good cheere, and affure your selues that we shall prosper: for God doth foreshewe vs by this fight we fee, that some one of the chiefest thinges now in highest place and dignitie shall be eclipsed. And at this present time what thing carieth greater glory and fame, than the tyrannie of Dionysius? Therefore you must thinke, that so soone as you arrive in Sicilia, your felues shall put out his light and glory. This interpretacion of the eclipse of the Moone, did C Mileas the Soothsayer make, before all the whole companye. But touching the swarme of bees that lighted on the poope of Dions (hippe, he told him, and his friends privately: that he Wonders ner had many straunge signes and wonderfull tokens from aboue. Among others, there came pronders are an Eagle that fnatched the partifan out of the fouldiers handes, and caried it quite away with pearing must her, and then let it fall into the fea. The fea also beating against the walls of the castell, was as Diony sum.

of it, found it true. Furthermore, a fowe farrowed pygges that lacked no parts of the body, but onely their eares. This the Soothfayers fayd did fignific rebellion, and disobedience of his n subjects: & that the Citizens would no more heare him, nor obey his tyranny. Furthermore, they told also, that the sweetenes of the falt water prognosticated to the Syracysans, change of cruell and euill time, vnto good and ciuil gouernment: and that the Eagle, Jupiters minifter, and the partifan, the marke and token of the kingdom and Empire, did betoken that Jupiter the chiefe of all gods had determined to destroy and put downe the tyranny. Theopompus reporteth this matter thus. So Dions fouldiers were imbarked into two great shippes of butden, and another third shippe that was not very great, and two pynnases with thirtye owers ration, followed them. For their armor and weapon, beside those the souldiers had: he caried two thowsand targets, a great number of bowes and arrowes, of darts, of pykes, and plenty of vittells: that they should lacke nothing all the time they were vpon the sea, considering that E their iorney stoode altogether at the curtesie of the windes and sea, and for that they were affrayd to lande, understanding that Philistus roade at anker in the coast of Apulgira, with a

But with much a doe they bare of the (hippes with their great longe poles, and wandred vp and downe the fea, not knowing whether they went, vntill the storme ceased. Then they met a thippe, whereby they knew that they were in the flat, which the Marriners call the heads of the great Syrte. Thus they wandring vp and downe, being maruelous angry that the fea was calme, there rose a little South wind from the land, although they least looked for any fuch wind at that time, and litle thinking it would so have chaunged: but seeing the wind rise bigger and bigger, they packed on all the fayles they had, and making their prayers vnto the gods they crossed the sea, and sayled from the coast of Libia, directly vnto Sicilband had B the winde so lucky, that at the fift daye they were neare vnto a litle village of Sicilia, called Synalus, Cap- Minoa, the which was subject to the Carthaginians, Synalus Carthaginian, being at that time Captaine and gouernor of the towne of MINOA, and Dions friende, was there by

But this did most of all encorage the souldiers, bicause Dionysius at their arrivall, was not then in Sigilia: for it chaunced fo, that not many dayes before he went into I TALY, with foure score sayle. Therefore when Dion willed them to remayne there a fewe dayes to refresh them felues, bicause they had bene so fore sea beaten a long time together: they them selues would not, they were fo glad to imbrace the occasion offred them, and prayed Dion to leade them forthwith to Syracvs A. time had taken such order, that there rose no tumult nor mutinie in the citie, though they all of them lacked no good will to rebell: but bicause they were vncerteine whether this rumor was true or falle, being affrayd, euery man was quiet. Now there chaunced a straunge missortune vnto the Messenger, that caried the letters vnto Dionysius. For after he had passed the straight, and that he was arrived in the citie of RHEGGIO of ITALYES side, making haste to come to the citie of CAVLONIA, where Dionyline was: he met by the way one of his acquain- E tance that caried a mutton but newly facrificed. This good fellow gaue him a peece of it, and the Messenger spurred away with all the speede he could possible. But when he had ridden the most part of the night, he was so weary and drowsie for lacke of sleepe, that he was driven to lye downe. So he lay downe vpon the ground, in a wodde hard by the high way. The fauor of this fleshe brought a woulfe to him, that caried away the fleshe and the portmantew it was wrapt in and in the which also were his letters of aduertisement, which he caried vnto Dionyflus. When he awoke out of his fleepe, and faw that his portmantew was gone: he enquired for it, and went wandring uppe and downe a long time to feeke it: howbeit all in vaine, for he could never find it. Therefore he thought it was not good for him to goe to the tyranne without his letters, but rather to flie into some vnknowen place where no body knew him. Thus F ouerlate received Dionysius advertisement by others of this warre, which Dion made in SI-CILIA. In the meane time, the CAMARINIANS came and ioyned with Dions army, in the highe

A way towards Syracvia: and still there came vnto him also a great number of the Syracvi sans that were uppe in armes, which were gotten into the field. On the other fide certaine CAMPANIANS and LEONTINES, which were gotten into the castell of Epipoles with Timeerates, of purpose to keepe it: Vpon a false rumor Dion gaue out (and which came vnto them) that he would first goe against their townes: they for sooke Timoerates, and went to take order to defend their owne goods. Dion vnderstanding that, being lodged with his armie in a place called MACRE: he prefently remoued his campe being darke night, and marched forward till he came vnto the river of Anapus, which is not from the citie aboue tenne furlongs of: and there staying a while, he sacrificed vnto the river, and made his prayer, and worshipped the rifing of the Sunne. At the felfe same instant also, the Soothsayers came and told him, that B the gods did promise him assured victorie. And the souldiers also seeing Dion weare a garland of flowers on his head, which he had taken for the ceremonic of the facrifice: all of them with one selfe good will tooke euery man one of them, beeing no lesse then fine thowsande men that were gathered together by the way, and but flenderly armed with fuch thinges as came first to hand, howbeit supplying with good will their want of better furniture and armor) and when Dion commaunded them to marche, for ioy they ranne, and incoraged one another with great cryes, to shew them selues valliant for recourrye of their libertie. Nowe for them that were within the citie self of Syracvsa, the noble men & chief Citizens went to receive them at the gates in their best gownes. The common people on the other side ranne and set voon them that tooke part with the tyranne, and spoyled them that were called the PROSA-C. GOGIDES (as much to fay, the common Promoters of men) the detestablest villaines, hateful to the gods and men. For they like Sicophants and bufietale bearers, would iet vp and downe the citie, and mingle amonge the Citizens, having an oer in every mans matter, being full of prittle prattle, and busie headed, to know what every man sayd and did, and then to goe cary it to the tyranne. These men were they that had their payment first of all for they killed them Distriction with dry blowes, beating them to death with staues. When Timocrates could not enter into flame. the castell with them that kept it, he tooke his horse backe, and fled out of the citie, and flying made all men affrayd and amased where he came, enlarging Dions power by his report, bi-cause it should not seeme that for feare of a trifle, he had for saken the citie. In the meane time, Dion came on towards the citie with his men, and was come so neare, that they might see him D plainly from the citie, marching foremost of all, armed with a fayer bright white corfelet, hauing his brother Megacles on his right hande of him, & Callippus ATHENIAN On the left hand, crowned with garlands of flowers: and after him also there followed a hundred souldiers that were straungers, chosen for his gard about him, and the rest came matching after in good order of battel, being led by their Captaines. The Syracvs and faw him comming, and went Dionrecels out and received him as a holy and bleffed procession, that brought them their libertie & popular state againe, the which they had lost the space of eight and fortyeyeares. When Division was come into the citie by the gate called Menitide, he caused his trompetter sownd to appeafe the rumor and tumult of the people. Then he commaunded a Herawld to proclayme a - Dionrefles lowd, that Dion and Megacles, who were come to put downe the tyranny, did fet all the Syna-rethibe Sy-E cysans at libertie, and all the other Sicilians also, from the bondage and subjection of the libertie, tyranne: and bicause Dion him selfe was desirous to speake vnto the people, he went to the vpper part of the towne called Acradina. The Syracus and all the streetes thorough as he paffed by, had on either hand of him prepared facrifices, and fet vp tables, and cuppes vppon them: and as he passed by their houses, they cast slowers and frutes on him, and made prayers vnto him, as if he had bene a god. Now vnder the castell there was a place called Pentapyla, a Dionyfine clocke to know by the Sunne how the day went, the which Dionyfind had caused to be made, stacked and it was of a good prety height. Dion got vp vpon it, and from thence made his oration to the people that were gathered round about him, exhorting and perswading his contry men to doe their endeuor to recouer their libertie againe, and to mainteyne it. They being in a F maruelous ion withall, and desirous to please Dion: did choose him and his brother Megaeles their Lieuetenants generall, with absolute power and authoritie. Afterwards also, by the consent of Dion him selfe and his brother, and at their requestes in like manner, they chose

DION. 1042 twenty other Captaines, of the which the most part of them had bene banished by the tyran. A and were returned againe with Dion. The Soothfayers and Prognosticators liked it well, and fayd it was a good figne for Dion, that he trode that fumptuous building and workemanship of the tyranne vnder his feete, when he made his oration: but bicause the hande of the diall did shewe the course of the Sunne, which neuer leaueth going, vpon the which he got vppe when he was chosen Lieuetenant generall with absolute power and authoritie: they were affrayd againe, that it was a figne Dions affayres should have a sodaine chaunge of fortune. After this, Dion having taken the castell of EPIPOLES, he set all the Citizens at libertie which were kept there as prisoners in captiuitie by the tyranne, and enuyroned the castell round about with a wall. Within feuen dayes after, Dionysius returned by sea to the castell of Syracvs a, and therewithall also came the carts loden with armor and weapon to Syracvsa, the R which Dion had left with Synalus: the which Dion caused to be distributed among the Citizens of Syracy sathat had none. Others did furnishe them selues as well as they could, and shewed that they had corage and good will to fight for the maintenance and defence of their Dissipline fit libertie. In the meane time, Dissyline lent Ambassadors, first vnto Dissy privately, to see if he would yeld to any composition. But Dion would not heare them, but bad them tell the SYRA-CVSANS Openly what they had to fay, being men that were free, and enjoyed libertie. Then the Ambaffadors spake in the behalfe of the tyranne, vnto the people of Syracvsa, promifing them with mild and gentle wordes, that they should paye no more subsedies and taxes, but very litle, and should be no more troubled with warres, other then such as they them felues should like of. The Syracus ans made a mockery at those offers, and Dionalso aun- C. fivered the Ambassadors, and willed Dionysius to send no more to the Syrac vsans, before he had disposses him selfe of his tyranny: & so that he would leave it, he would be his meane to obtayine all things iust and reasonable of the people. Dionysius liked very well of this good offer, and therefore fent his Ambassadors againe to praye the Syracus ansthat they would appoynte some amongest them to come to the castell, to talke with him for the benefit and commoditie of the common wealth, that he might heare what they would alleage, and they also what aunswer he would make. Dion chose certaine whome he sent vnto him. Now there ranne a rumor in the citie amonge the Syracvsans, which came from the castell: that Diomyfins would willingly of him felfe, rather then by reason of Dions comming, depose him felse of the tyrannie. But this was but a false alarom, and crafty fetche of Diony lius, to intrappe the D Syracys ans by. For those that were fent him from the citie, he kept them prisoners every man of them: and one morning having made his fouldiers drinke wine luftely, which he kept in pay to gard his person, he sent them with great furie to assault the wall the Syracvsans had built against the castell. Nowe, bicause the Syracysans looked for nothing lesse then for the sodaine assault, and for that these barbarous people with a wonderfull corage & great tumult ouerthrew the wal, and others of them also did set vpon the Syrac vsans: there was not a man of them that durft make head to fight with them, fauing the fouldiers that were straungers, whome Dion had brought with him. Who, when they heard the noyse, ranne straight to repulse them, and yet they them selues could not well tell what they should doe vpon that fodaine. For they could heare nothing, for the great noyfe and hurly burley of the E Syracysans which fled with great diforder, and came and mingled them felues amongeft them. Til at length, Dion perceiuing he could not be heard, to shew them by deede what they should doe: he went first him selfe against these barbarous people, and about him there was a cruell and bloody fight. For his enemies knewe him as well as his owne men, and they all ranne vpon him with great cryes. Now for Dion him felfe, in deede bicause of his age, he was heauier then was requisite for one that should away with the paynes of such battells: but he had fuch a valliant corage in him, that he went thorough with all luftely, and flue them that did affaile him. Yet he had his hand also thrust thorough with a pyke, and very hardly did his curaces holde out the blowes of the darts and thrusts by hande which he received on them, they were so mangled and hacked with such a number of darts and pykes passed thorough F his shield and broken on him, that in the ende he was beaten downe: how beithis souldiers refcued him straight. Then he made Timonides their Captaine, and he him selfe tooke his horse charge and office he bare vnder the tyrannes: how beit a very vnconstant man in every thing. & would not continue long in a mind, & least constant in warres, where he had great charge of honor in hand. He had fallen out with Dion in PELOPONNES VS, wherefore he determined to come with a power by him felfe, and with his owne fleete against the tyranne. So he arris, Hereclides ued at length at Syracvsa, with feuen gallies, and three other shippes, where he found Dio-Syrainsa mylius againe shut vp into his castell with a wall, and the Synacy sans also to have the better hand of him. Then he began to curry fauor with the common people all the wayes he could possibly deuise, having by nature a certaine pleasing manner to winne the common people, which feeke nothing els but to be flattered. Furthermore, he found it the easier for him to winne them, bicaule the people did already mislike Dions squeritie, as a man too squere and cruell to gouerne a common wealth. For they had now their will so much, and were growen fo stronge headed, bicause they sawe them selues the stronger: that they would be flattered (as commonly the people be in free cities, where they onely be Lordes, and docrule) before they were fully fet at libertie. Therefore first of all, not being called together by the authoritie

A backe, and went up and downe the citie, staying and quieting the flying of the STRACY SANS. Then he fent for his fouldiers the straungers, which he had put in garrison in that part of the citie called the A CRADINE to keepe it, and brought them being freshe, against the barbarous people of the castell that were wearied, and almost all of them discoraged to attempt any further enterprise. For they had made this salve out, in hope to have taken all the citte at the first onset, onely running vp and downe: but when contrary to their expectacion, they met these valliant fouldiers and freshe supply, they then beganne to retyre againe vnto the castell. And the GRECIAN fouldiers on the other fide, perceiuing they gaue backe, they came the fafter vpon them, so that they were compelled to turne their backes, and were driven within their walls, after they had flayne three score and sourceeene of Dions men, and lost a great number of their owne. This was a noble victorie and therefore the Syracvs ans gaue the fouldiers Dione villary that were straungers, an hundred siluer Minas, in reward for their good service: & they gave of Diony state.

he should loue best, as his wife, his sonneand lister: and last of all, full of most humble requests and intreaties with forowe and lamentacion. But that which most moued Dion of all other was, that he required him not to destroye the tyrannye, but rather to take it for him selfe, and not to fet them at libertie that hated him, and would alwayes remember the mischiese he had done vnto them: & that he would him selfe take vpon him to be Lord, sauing by that meanes the liues of his parents and friends. When these letters had bene red before the whole affembly of the people, the Syracusans thought not how to reuerence (as they ought) with admiration, the inflexible constancy and magnanimitie of Dion, that stoode firme and fast for iuflice and vertue, against such vehement intreatie and perswasion of his kinssolke and friends:

but they contrarily began to be affrayd, and to mistrust him, as he that of necessitie should be forced to pardon the tyranne, for the great pledges and oftages he had of him. Wherefore, Dion their generall, a crowne of gold. After this, there came letters to Dion by a trompet from the castell, written from the women of his house: and among the packet of letters, there was one of them directed: to my father: the which Hipparinus wrote vnto him. For that was Di-Hipparinus, and companion in armes. All the other letters that were fent, were openly red before the affembly of the Syracusans, and did only concerne requests of these women unto Dion, The SYRACVS ANS would not have the supposed letter of his sonne to be openly red: but Dion a confirmation of their mindes opened it and sound that it was Dional to their mindes opened it and sound that it was Dional to their mindes opened it and sound that it was Dional to the sound to the soun gainst their mindes opened it, and found that it was Dionysius letter, who by wordes, made the Dion direction of it vnto Dion, but in effect, he spake vnto the Syracvsans. For in sight, it seemed a manner of request and instification of him selse: but in truth, it was written of purpose to accuse Dion, First of all he remembred him of the thinges he had done before, for the establithey began to choose them new gouernors, and the rather, bicause they heard that Heraclides was comming vnto them, whome they loued fingulerly well . This Heraclides was one of Heraclides them that had bene banished, a good souldier and Captaine, and well esteemed of for the

of the governors: they all ranne in a furye, of their ownelight heads, vnto the place of com- A mon affemblies, and there choic Heraclides Admirall. Then Dion understanding this, came to complaine of the injurie they had done him, declaring vnto them, that to give this power now vnto Heraclides, was to take that away which they had first given vnto him : bicause he should no more be generall, if they chose any other Admirall by sea then him selfe. The Sy-RACV SANS then, as it were against their willes, did reuoke the power they had given vnto Heraclides: but afterwards Dion fent for Heraclides, to pray him to come home to him. When he came, he rebuked him a litle, and tolde him that it was not honeftly, nor profitably done of him, to fue to the people, & to contend for honor against him in so daungerous a tyme, when the least occasion in the world was enough to have marred all. Afterwards Dion him selfe called an affembly againe of the citie, and established Heraclides Admirall: and perswaded the R

Citizens to give him fouldiers, as he had in deede. Heraclides outwardly feemed to honor Dion, and confessed openly that he was greatly bound vnto him, and was alway at his heeles very lowly, being ready at his commaundement: but in the meane time, fecretly he inticed the common people to rebell, & to stirre vp those whom he knew meete men to like of chaunge. Whereby he procured Dion such trouble, and brought him into such perplexitie, that he knew not well what way to take. For if he gaue them adulle to let Dionylius quietly come out of the castell: then they accused him, and sayd he did it to saue his life. If on the other side. bi-cause he would not trouble them, he continued seege still, and did establishe nothing: then they thought he did it of purpose to draw out the warres in length, bicause he might the lenger time remaine their chiefetaine generall, and so to keepe the Citizens lenger in feare. At C Soft a wicked that time there was one Softs in SYRACVS A, 2 man of no name, but noted among the SYRA-CVS ANS for his villany and wickedness efteeming that full and ample libertie, when he might vnchecked licentiously speake what he would, as in deede he did. For he seeking to doe Dion a displeasure: first of all one day at a common counsel he stoode vp on his feete, and called the SYRACVSANS beaftes, (amongest many other vile wordes he gaue them) if they did not per-ceiue, that being come from a fond and droncken tyrannie, they had nowe receiued a fober master, and a wife and ware tyranne. So when he had thus openly shewed him selfe an enemy vnto Dion, he came no more that daye into the market place: but the next morning he was feene ronning up and downe the citie naked, his head and face all of a gore bloud, as if he had bene followed by men to have flayne him . Thus Sofis comming in this manner into the mid- D dest of the market place, cryed out, that Dions straungers had lyen in wayte for him, and had handled him in this fort, thewing his wound on his head. Many of the people tooke this matter very grieuoufly, and cried out vpon Dion, and fayd it was vilely and tyrannically done of him: by feare of murther and daunger, to take away the libertie from the Citizens to speake. Nowe though the whole affembly hereuppon fell into an vprore withall, Diox notwithstanding came thither to cleare him felfe of these accusations, and made them presently see, that this Softs was brother to one of Dionyfus gard: who had put into his head, in this fort to put the citie of Syracus ain an uprore, bicause Dionysius had no other hope nor meanes to escape, but by stirring vp faction and sedition among them, to make one of them fall out with another. The Surgions were fent for forthwith to fearche the wounde of this Sofis: who founde B that it was rather a litle scratche, then any violent wound given him. For the woundes or cuts of a fword, are euer deepest in the middest: and Sosis cut was but very litle, and not deepe, hauing had many beginnings, and given him (as it feemed) at fundry times, that for very paine, the party that cut him was driven to leave of, & so came to cut him at divers times. Furthermore, there came certaine of his friends in the meane time, that brought a raser before the affembly, and reported that as they came, they met Sofis by the way all bloudied: who fayd, that he fled from Dions fouldiers, which had but newly hurt him. Whereuppon they prefently followed them, but found no man, and onely they faw a rafer, which fome bodye had cast vpon a hollow stone thereabout, where they first saw him comming vnto them. Thus Sosis deuise had but euill successe. For beside all these proofes and tokens, Dions houshold servaunts F came to be a witnes against him: that very earely in the morning he went abroad alone with a rafer in his hand. Then they that before did burden and accuse Dian, knewe not what to fay

A the matter, but shroncke away : whereuppon the people condening Sofis to death, they were soft condens quiet againe with Dion. Yet were they alwaies affraid of these souldiers that were straungers.

specially when they saw the greatest conflicts they had with the tyranne, was by sea, after that Philiftus was come from the coast of Apvolta with a great number of gallies to ayde the tyranne. For then they thought, that these souldiers the straungers being armed at all partes to fight by land, they would do them no more feruice by lea: bicause the Citizens them selues were they that kept them in fafetie, for that they were men practifed to fight by fea, and were also the stronger by meanes of their ships. But beside all this, the onely thing that made them to be coragious again, was the good fortune they had at the battel by fea, in the which when they had ouercome Philiftus, they cruelly and barbaroufly vsed him. Truely Ephorus faith, that Philiftus flain B Philistus flue him felfe, when he sawe his galley taken. Howbeit Timonides (who was alway with Dien from the first beginning of this warre) writing vnto Speulippus the Philosopher saith that Philistus was taken aliue, bicause his galley ranne a land: and that the Syracysans first tooke of his curaces, and stripped him naked, and after they had done him all the villanie and fpight they could, they cut of his head, and gaue his body vnto boyes, commaunding them to dragge it into that part of the citie called ACRADINE, and then to cast it into the common primie. Timeus also to spight him the more, fayth that the boyes tyed the deadebodye by his lame legge, and so dragged him vp and downe the citie, where all the Syrac vs ans did what villanie to it they could, being glad to fee him dragged by the legge, that had fayd Dienyfius should not flie from the tyranny vpon a light horse, but that they should pull him out by the C legge against his will . Now Philistus reporteth this matter thus, not as spoken to Dionysius by him selfe, but by some other. But Timeus taking a just occasion and culler to speake cuil of the Timeus, and good will, fidelitie, and care that Philiftus had alwayes feemed to thew in the confirmation & Histories 44 defence of the tyrannie: doth liberally bestow injurious wordes on him in this place. Nowe short regrefor them whome he had in deede offended, if they of malice and spight to be reuenged, did med. offerhim crueltie, peraduenture they were not much to be blamed: but for them that fince his death haue written the leasts, who were neuer offended by him in his life time, and who ought to shewe them selves discreete in their writing, me thinkes that if they had regarded their owne credit and estimation, they should not so fondly and outragiously haue reproued the aduersities and misfortunes, which by fortune may as well chaunce to the honestest man, D as vnto him. Thus fondely doth Ephorus prayle Philiftus, who though he have an excellent fine wit to counterfeate goodly excuses, and cunningly to hide wicked and dithonest partes. and eloquently to deuise by honest words to defend an euill cause: yet can not he with all the fiue wits he hath excuse him self, that he hath not bene the onely man of the world that hath most fauored tyrannes, and that hath euer loued, and specially defired power, wealth, and alliance with tyrannes. But he in my opinion taketh the right course of an Historiographer, that nether doth commend Philiftus doings, nor yet casteth his aduersities in his teeth to his reproche. After Philistus death, Dionysius sent vnto Dion, to make him an offer to deliuer him the castell, armor, munition, and souldiers that were in it, with money also to paye them for fine monethes space. For him selfe, he prayed that he might be suffered to goe safely into Ira-E 1 y, and to lye there, to take the pleasure of the frutes of the contry called GYARTA, which was within the territorie of Syracvs a, and lyeth out from the sea towardes the mayne land, Dion refused this offer, and aunswered the Ambassadors that they must moue the Syracvanisit it. They supposing they should easily take Dionysius aliue, would not heare the Ambassadors speake, but turned them away. Dionysius seeing no other remedie, lest the castell in the handes Dienysius styof his eldeft sonne Apollocrates, and having a lusty gale of winde, he secretly imbarked cer this man halound had wind having a lusty gale of winde, he secretly imbarked cer this man halound had wind have been a large that the secret winds. taine of his men he loued best, with the richest thinges he had, and so hoysed sayle, vnwares Apollogrates to Heraelides, the Admirall of Syracus A. The people were maruelously offended with He- the eldess raclides for it, and beganne to mutine against him. But Heraclides, to pacific this tumult of the Dion fine the people, suborned one Hippon an Orator, who preferred the lawe Agraria vnto the people, for ponger. F the division of all the Iland amongest them; and that the beginning of libertie was equalitie, and of bondage pouertie, vnto them that had no landes. Heraclides gitting his confent to this decree, and stirring the common people to sedition against Dion, that with stoode it: perswa-

1046 ded the Syrac vsans not onely to confirme the lawe Hippon had propownded, but alforo A discharge the hyered straungers, to choose other Captaines and gouernors, and to rid them selues of Dions seuere gouernment. But they supposing straight to have bene rid from the tyranny, as from a long and grieuous ficknes, ouerrashly taking vpon them like people that of long time had bene at libertie, they vtterly vndid them felues, and ouerthrew Dions purpofe: who like a good Phisition was carefull to see the citie well ordered and gouerned. So when they were affembled to choose new officers in the middest of sommer, there sel such horrible thunders, and other terrible stormes, & vnfortunate signes in the element, that for the space offifteene dayes together, the people were stil scattered and dispersed when they were assembled: infomuch, that being affraide of these signes aboue, they durst not at that time create any new Captaines. Certaine dayes after, as the Orators had chosen a fayer time to proceede B to the election of officers: an oxe drawing in a cart (being daily acquainted with enery fight and noyle) fodainly without any occasion offered, fell into a madnes against the carter that draue him, and breaking his yoke afonder, ranne straight to the Theater, and there made the people runne into euery corner, to flye and faue them felues: and then flinging, and bearing all downe before him that stoode in his way, he ranne through as much of the citie, as the enemies afterwards wanne of them. This notwithstanding, the SYRACVS ANS making light accompt of all these signes, they chose fine and twenty Captaines, of the which Heraclides was one: and fecretly they fent to feele the hiered fouldiers, to fee if they could entice them from Dion, to cause them to take their part, and made them large promises to make them free men, as them selues of Syracysa. The souldiers would not be enticed from him, but faithfully & C louingly tooke Dion amongest them with their armor and weapon, and putting him in the middest of them, led him in this manner out of the citie, and did no man hurt, but reprouing Dion depar their vnthankfulnes and villanie vnto all those they met by the way. Then the Syracus ans despiling them for their smal number, & bicause they did not first set upon them, but trusting on the other fide to them selues for that they were the greater number: they came to assayle them, supposing they should easily our come them in the citie, & kil every man of them. Dion being thus at a straight, that of necessitie he must fight against his owne contry men, or els be flaine him felfe with his fouldiers: he held up his hands to the SYRAC VSANS & very earneftly praied them to be content, pointing them with his finger to the castell that was full of their enemies, which shewed them selues vpon the wals, & saw what they did. In the ende, when he D faw that he could not pacific their furie & tumult, and that all the citie was in an vprore with the prittle prattle of these seditious people, who like the sea were caried with the wind: he did yet forbid his fouldiers to give any charge vpon them, who notwithstanding made a countenaunce with great cryes, and ratling of their harnes, as if they had ment to ronne on them.

Then the Syracus and durst not abide by it, but ranne away like sheepe through the streets,

& no man chased them. So Dion called backe his men againe, & led them directly into the co-

lines of the try of the LEONTINES. The the new officers & gouernors of Syracvsa, perceiuing that the Бугаси[апл. women laughed them to scorne: bicause they would recouer the shame they had lost, they armed their men a new againe, & did marche after Dion to fight with him, whome they ouertooke at a river, as he was ready to passe over. Then began their horsemen a little to skirmishe B with Dions company. But when they faw he did no more beare with their faults for contries fake, but frowned in deede vpon them, & did fet his men in battel ray against them: then they turned their backs againe, with moreshame and reproache then before, and so fled vnto the citie of Syracus a, & had not many of their men flaine. The LEONTINES received Dion very honorably, tooke the straungers his fouldiers, and gaue them pay, & made them free Citizens with them: & fent Ambaffadors also vnto the Syrac vsans, to wil them to let the straugers hauetheir pay. The Syracvs ans on their fide also, fent Ambassadors vnto the LEON-TINES to accuse Dion. So all their confederats were assembled in the citie of the LEONTINES, &in that affembly, after both parties had bene heard, to heare what they would fay:it was indged that the Syracv sans were to blame. How beit they would not stand to the judgement of their confederats, for they were now growen proud & careles, bicause they were gouerned by no man, but had Captaines that studied to please them, & were affraid also to displease them.

A After that, there arrived certain gallies of Dionysius, at Syracysa, of the which, Nypsius N BA-POLITANWAS captaine: which brought vittels & money, to help the that were beleged within the castel. These gallies were fought with, & the Syracys ans obtained victorie, and tooke foure of the tyrannes gallies with three bancks of owers a peece: howbeit they fondly abufed their victorie. For they having no body to commaund nor rule them, imployed all their ioy, in ryoting and bancketting, and in fond and diffolute meetings, taking fo litle care and re- The meeting. gard to their busines, that now when they thought the castel was sure their owne, they almost some and lost their citie. For Nypsius perceiuing that every part of the citie was out of order, and that synandam. the common people did nothing all day long vnto darke night, but by bbe and drinke drunke, dauncing after their pypes and howboyes, and that the gouernors them selues were very R glad also to see such feathing, or els for that they diffembled it, and durst not commaund and compell them that were droncke: he wisely tooke the occasion offered him, and scaled the wall which had shut up the castell, and wanne it, and ouerthrewe it. Then he sent the barbarous fouldiers into the citie, and commaunded them to doe with them they met, what they would or could. The Syrac vs ans then too late found their fault, and hardly gaue presentemedie. they were fo amazed and fodainely fet on: for in deede they made a right facke of the citie. Here men were killed, there they ouerthrewe the wall, in another place they carried away women and litle children prisoners into the castell, weeping and crying out: and lastly.

they made the Captaines at their wits ende, who could give no present order, nor have their men to serue them against their enemies, that came hand ouer head on euery side amongest c them. The citie being thus miserably in garboyle, and the ACRADINE also in great hazard of taking, in the which they put all their hope and confidence to rife againe: euery man thought then with him felfe that Dion must be sent for , but yet no man moued it notwithstanding, being ashamed of their vnthankefulnes and ouergreat folly they had committed, in driving him away . Yet necessitie inforcing them vnto it, there were certaine of the horsemen and of their confederats that cryed, they must fend for Dion, and the PELOPONNESIANS his fouldiers, which were with him in the territorie of the LEONTINES. Assoone as the first worde was heard, and that one had the hart to tell it to the people, all the Syracysans cryedout, there was the poynt: and they were so glad of it, that the water stoode in their eyes for ioy, and befought the gods it would please them to bringe him vnto them, they were so D desirous to haue him againe. For they called to minde howe valliant and resolute he was in daunger, and how that he was neuer affrayde, but did encorage them with his manhood in fuch fort, that being led by him, they were not affrayd to fet vpon their enemies. So the confederats for them, fent presently Archonides and Telefides vnto him: and the noble men that ferued on horsebacke, they sent him also fine amongest them, beside Hellanieus. Who tooke The Syracustheir horses, and posted for life, so that they came to the citie of the LEONTINES about fant doe fend Sunne set, and lighting from their horses, they went first of all and kneeled downe at Dions gaine. feete, and weeping, tolde him the miferable state of the Syracysans, Straight there came divers of the Leontines, and many of the Peloponnesian fouldiers unto Dion, mistrufting then that there was some newes in hand, to see the earnest and humble sute the Ambas-E fadors of Syracysa made vnto him . Wherefore Dion tooke them prefently with him, and brought them him felfe vnto the Theater, where the common counsells and affemblies of the citie were holden. Thither ranne enery man to heare what the matter was . Then Archonides and Hellanicus brought in by Dion, tolde openly before the whole affemblie, the greatnes of their miserie, and requested the hyered fouldiers to come and ayde the SYRA-CVSANS, forgetting the injurie they had received: confidering that they had more dearely payd for their follye, then they them selues whome they had so injured, would have made them to haue suffered. When they had sayd their mindes, there was a great silence through all the Theater: and then Dion rose vp, and beganne to speake. But the great teares that fell from his eyes would not suffer him to speake; wherefore the hyered souldiers being fory to fee him weepe, prayed him notto trouble him felfe, but to be of good corage. Then Dion letting goe the sorowe and griefe he had conceiued, he beganne to speakevnto them in this manner. My Lordes of Peloponnesvs, and you also the confederats: I have called you Disservation

DION. 1048 dini, perfect to gether to consult with you, what you should doe. For my selfe, it were no honesty for me to A angunem 19 confult what I should do now, when the city of Syracvs a standeth in peril of destruction: & therefore if I can not faue it from destruction, yet at the least I wil bury my selfe in the fire and ruine of my contry. But for you if it please you once more to helpe vs. vnaduised & more vnfortunate people: you shal by your meanes set the poore distressed city of Syracvs againe 2 foote, which is your deede. Or if it be fo, that remebring the injuries the Syrac vsans haue offred you, you wil suffer it to be destroyed: yet I besech the gods that at the least they will requite your valliantnes, fidelity, & good loue you have borne me vntil this prefent, befeeching " you to remêber Dion, who nether for sooke you at any time when you have bene injuried, nor his cotry men, when they were in trouble. So, going on stil with his tale, the mercenary straugers stepped forth with great noise, & praied him to leade them to ayde Syracvsa. Then the B Ambaffadors also that were fent from the Syracv sans, faluted & imbraced them, & prayed the gods to bleffe Dion & them, with al the good hap that might be. So when al was whisht & quiet, Dion willed them forthwith to goe & prepare them selues, & that they should be there ready armed after supper, determining the very same night to go to aide Syrac vsa. But now at SYRACVSA, while day light lasted, Dionylius fouldiers & captaines did al the mischief & vil-lany they could in the city. & when night came, they retired again into their castel, having lost very few of their men. Then the seditious gouernors of the SYRACVEANS tooke hart againe vnto them, hoping that the enemies would be conteted with that they had done: & therfore began a new to perswade the citizens to let Dion alone, & not to receive him with his mercenary fouldiers if they came to aide him, saying, that they them selues were honester men then C. the straungers, to saue their city, & to defend their liberty without help of any other. So other Ambassadors were sent again vnto Dion, some from the captaines & gouernors of the city, to flay them that they should not come: & others also from the horsemen, & noble Citizens his friends to haste his iorney. Whereuppo by reason of this variance, Dion marched very softly at his ease. Now by night, Dions enemies within the city got to the gates, & kept the that Dion should not come in. Nypfius on the other side made a fally out of the castel with his mercenary fouldiers, being better appointed, & a greater nuber of the then before: & with the he straight plucked downe all the wal which they had built before the castel, & ran & sacked the city. At this fally out of the castel, they did not only kill the men they met, but women & litle children alfo, & staied no more to spoile, but to destroy & put all to hauock. For bicause Dionysius saw D that he was brought to a straight & desperat case, he bare such mortal malice against the S y-RACVSANS, that fith there was no remedy but that he must needes forgo his tyranny: he determined to burye it, with the vtter destruction & desolation of their citie. And therefore to preuent Dions ayde, & to make a quick dispatch to destroy all: they came with burning torches in their hands, & did fet fire of all things they could come to: & further of they fiered their darts & arrowes, & bestowed them in every place of the city. So, they that fled for the fire, were met withall. & flayne in the streetes by the fouldiers, and others also that ranne into their houses, were driven out againe by force of fire. For there were a number of houses that were afire, and fel downe you them that went and came. This mifery was the chiefest cause why all the Sya fire by Dio-RACVSANS agreed together, to fet open the gates vnto Dion. For when Dion heard by the way, E that Dionysius souldiers were gone againe into the castell, he made no great haste to marche forward: but when day was broken, there came certaine horsemen from Syracvs a vnto Dion, who brought him newes that the enemies had once againe taken the city. Then also came other of his enemies vnto him, and prayed him to make hafte. Now their miserie increasing still, and they being brought into hard state: Heraclides first sent his brother vnto Dion, and then Theodotes his Vncle, to pray him to come quickly, and helpe them. For now there was no man left to refift the enemies, bicause he him selse was hurt, and the citie also was in manner cleane burnt & destroyed. When these newes came to Dion, he was yet about three score furlong from the towne. So he told his mercenary fouldiers the daunger the towne was in, & having encoraged them, heled them no more fayer & foftly, but running towards the city, F & meeting Messengers one of anothers neck as he went, that prayed him to make all the posfible spede he could. By this meanes, the fouldiers marching with woderful spede & good will

1049 A together, he entred the gates of the city at a place called HECATOMPEDON. First of all, he sent the lightest armed he had, against the enemies, to thende that the Syracy and seeing them, they might take a good hart again to them: whileft he himfelf in the meane time did fet al the other heavy armed fouldiers and Citizens that came to joyne with him, in battell raye, & did cast them into divers squadrons, of greater length then breadth, and appointed them that should have the leading of them, to thend that setting vpon the enemies in divers places together, they should put them in the greater feare & terror. When he had set all things in this order, & had made his prayers vnto the gods, & that they faw him marching through the citie against their enemies: then there rose such a common noyle & rejoycing, & great showte of the fouldiers, mingled with vowes, prayers, and perswasions of all the SYRACVS ANS: that B they called Dion their god & fauior, & the mercenary fouldiers their brethren & fellow Citizens. Furthermore, there was not a Syracvs anthat fo much regarded his owne life & person, but he seemed to be more affraid of the losse of Dion only, then of all the rest. For they law him the foremost man ronning through the dauger of the fire, treading in bloud, & vpon dead bodies that lav flaine in the middest of the streets. Now, in deede to charge the enemies, it was Dionifight in a maruelous daungerous enterprife : for they were like mad beafts, & floode befide in battell the dise of rav along ft the wal which they had ouerthrowen, in a very daungerous place, & hard to win.

Howbeit the daunger of the fire did most of all trouble & amaze the straungers, & did stoppe their way. For, on which side soeuer they turned them, the houses round about them were all of a fire, and they were driven to marche over the burnt timber of the houses, and to ronne in c great daunger of the walls of the house sides that fell on them, & to passe through the thicke smoke mingled with dust, & beside, to keepe their rancks with great difficultie. And whe they came to affaile the enemies, they could not come to fight hand to hand, but a few of them in number, bicause of the straightness of the place: howbeit the Syracvs ans with force of cries & showtes did so animat, & encorage their men, that at length they draue Nypsius & his men to forfake the place. The most part of them got into the castell, being very neare vnto them 20 place to forfake the place. the other that could not get in in time, fled itraglingly vp and downe, whom the GRECIAN on to flee into fouldiers flue, chafing of them. The extremitie of the time did not prefently suffer the Conquerors to reape the frute of their victory, nether the ioyes & imbracings meete for fo great an exployte. For the SYRACVSANS went every man home to his owne house, to quenche the D fire, the which could scarcely be put out all the night. When daye brake, there was none of these seditious flatterers of the people that durst tary in the citie, but codemning them selues they fled to take their fortune. Heraclides and Theodotes came together of their owne good wills to yeld them felues vnto Dion, confessing that they had done him wronge, and humbly praying him to shew him selfe better vnto them, then they had shewed them selues vnto him: & that it was more honorable for him, being euery way vnmatchable for his vertues, to shew him felfe more noble to conquer his anger, then his vnthankfull enemies had done: who contending with him before in vertue, did now confesse themselves to be farre inferior vnto him. This was the summe & effect of Heraclides & Theodotes submission vnto Dion. But his friends did perswade him not to pardon two such wicked men, who did malice & enuy his honor: and E as he would doe the straungers his souldiers any pleasure, that he should put Heraelides into their hands, to roote out of the common wealth of Syracvs a, his vile manner to flatter and curry fauor with the people, the which was as daungerous and great a plague to a citie, as the tyranny, Dion pacifying them, aunswered. Other generals of armies, said he, do imploy al their wits in marshall exercise & warres: but for him selfe, that he had of long time studied, & lear-Dions marsy

The heartest noble proofe whereof is most seene, not in vling honest men and his friends moderately, but profit he sould thewing mercy also vnto his enemies, & forgetting his anger against them that have offended the Academy him: and that for his part, he had rather ouercome Heraclides, not in riches and wifedom, but at Athens. in clemency & iustice, for therein chiefly consisted excellencie, sith no man els in warres can F challenge power & gouernment, but fortune, that ruleth most. And though Heraclides, sayd Dion asifwering his friends thus he forgaue Heraelides, & beginning againe to shut up the castell with a wal round about he comanded the Syrac vs ans euery man of them to cut downea stake. & to bringe it thither. So, when night was come, fetting his fouldiers the straungers in hand withall, whileft the Syracvs ansslept & tooke their ease: by morning he had compassed the castel round about with a pale. The next day, they that saw the greatnes & sodaine expedition of this worke, wondred much at it, as wel the enemies, as also the Citizens: & when he had buried the dead bodies, & redeemed them that were taken prisoners, (which were not much B leffe then two thowfand persons) he called a common counsel of the citie, in the which Heraslides made a motion, that Dion should be chosen general of Syrac vsa, with absolute power & authoritie, both by sea & land. The chiefest men of the citie liked very well of it, and would have had the people to have past it. But the rabble of these mariners, and other mechanical people liuing by their labor, would not fuffer Heraclides to be put from his Admiral(hip, but fel to mutinie, thinking that though Heraclides did them no pleasure els, yet he would euer be The freezed- a more populer man then Dion, & please the common people better. fire, & made Heraelides Admiral againe of the fea: howbeit he did anger them as much an oracufans against Dien. Heraclides done before. Wherefore Heraclides remaining at MESSINA, began thenceforth to enter into againe stirvebell against new practifes again, & to flatter the fouldiers & fea fairing men he had brought thether with Syraculani, him, & to stirre them vp to rebel against Dion, saying, that he would make him selfetyranne:& him selfe in the meane time secretly practised with Dionysius, by meanes of a Spartan called Pharax. The noblest men of the Syracvsansmistrusted it. & thereuppon there fell outgreat mutinie in their campe, whereby also followed great famine in Syracvsa: so that Dion was at fuch a straight, that he could not tell what to fay to it, & was reproued of all his friends for that he had againe preferred to great authoritie against him selfe, so vntractable a man, & so malicious & wicked a person as Heraclides was. Now, when Pharax laye in campe with an army neare vnto the citie of NAPLES, in the marches of the AGRIGENTINES: Dion did bringe D the army of the Syracus ans into the field, being yet determined not to fight with him til another time. But through Heraclides, & the sea mens crying out, that said he would not try this warre by battel, but would draw it out in length bicause he would be still generall: he was forced to give battell, and loft it. Howbeit the overthrow was not great, and happened rather bicause his men were at a jarre among them selves, by reason of their faction and division, then otherwise, Dion therefore prepared to fight another battell, and gathered his men together againe, incoraging them, when even at twylight word was brought him that Heraclides with al his fleete was ynder faile towards Synacys a, meaning to take the citie, & to flut Dion & his army out of it. Wherefore he presently tooke with him the chiefest men of authoritie in the citie, and the most willingest men, and rode all night with them in such haste, that they were E at the gates of Syracvsa the next morning by nyne of the clocke, having ridden feuen hundredfurlong. After that, the Syracysans brake up their army by sea, bicause it did them then no feruice, and was beside chargeable keeping of it, and further did also breede sedition and trouble amongest their gouernors: and so went to lay straighter siege to the castell then ever they did, and built up the wall againe, which the enemies had ouerthrowen. Then Dionylius fonne feeing no aide to come to him from any parte, and that vittels failed them, and further, that the fouldiers began to mutine, being vnable to keepe them; he fel to a composition with

There was not a man at that time Dion. in all Syracvsa, but was there to fee this fight, or if by chaunce there were any absent, the other that were there called them thither as lowde as they could crie, faying, that they did not fee the goodliest day and sunne shine, which the citie of Syracvsa might see then at her rifing, the same being now restored againe to her former libertie. If vntill this present day they doe reckon the flying of Dionylius, for one of the rarest examples of fortunes chaunge, as one of the greatest and notablest thing that euer was : what ioy thinke we had they that draue him out, & what pleasure had they with them selves, that with the least meane that could be posfible, did destroy the greatest tyrannie in the world? So, when Apollocrates Dionysius sonne was imbarked, and that Dion was entred into the castell: the women within the castell would not E tary till he came into the house, but went to meete him at the gates, Arsstomaché leading Dions fonne in her hand, and Areta following her weeping, being verie fearefull how the thould call vie it for two respectes. The first, bicause nature had not framed him curreous and affable to winne men: fecondly, he did what he could to drawe the Syracysans to the contrarie, who were ouerlicentious & spoyled with too much flattery; for Heraelides began agains to be bufie with him. First of all, Dion sending for him to come to counsell, he sent him word he would compress a gaine against not come: and that being a private citizen, he woulde be at the common counfell amongest difficult of the citizens his companions in the government of the common wealth. In Dian Sent to deede to confesse a troth, Dion had sent for certaine CORINTHIANS, hoping the better to stablish the forme of a common wealth, which he had in his minde, when they were come. meath to the ment and authoritie of the people in a citie not being as it were a common wealth, but rather a fayer and market where thinges are folde, as Plato fayth) and to stablishe the LACONIAN or CRETAN common wealth, mingled with a Princely, and popular government; & that should be, Aristocratia, to wit, the number of a fewe noble men that should gouerne and direct the chiefelt and waightieft matters of state. And for that purpose, he thought the CORINTHIANS The authori- the metest men to help him to frame this comon wealth, cosidering that they gouerned their C it of the perph, refinibled affaires more by choosing a few number of the nobilitie, then otherwise, and that they did not by Piato 104 referre many thinges to the voyce of the people. And bicause he was assured that Heraclides fayer, or mar- would be against him in it all that he could, and that otherwise he knewe he was a seditious, a troublesome, and light headed fellow: he then suffered them to kill him who had long before wealth of the done it, if he had not kept them from it, & fo they went home to his house, and slue him there. The murther of Heraclides was much milliked of the SYRAE VSAN s: howbeit Dion caused him of Heraclides. to be honorablie buried, and brought his bodie to the grounde, followed with all his armie. Then he made an Oration him felfe to the people, and told them, that it was impossible to auoyde fedition and trouble in the citie, folong as Dion and Heraclides did both gouerne together. At that time there was one Callippus an ATHENIAN, a familiar of Dions, who (as Plato D fayth) came not acquainted with Dion through the occasion of his studie in Philosophie: but bicause he had bene his guide to bring him to see the secret misteries and ceremonies of the facrifices, and for fuch other like common talke and companie. This notwithstanding, Callippus did accompanie him in all this warre, and was verie muche honored of him, and was one of the first of all his frendes that entred into Syracvsa with him, and did valliantlie behaue callippus A- him felfe in all the battells and conflicts that were fought. This Callippus feeing that Dions best & chiefest frends were all slaine in this warre, & that Heraelides also was dead, that the people of Syrac vs a had no more any heade, and besides, that the souldiers which were with Dion did loue him better then any other man: he became the vnfaithfullest man and the veriest villan of all other, hoping that for reward to kill his frend Dion, he should vindoubtedly come to E haue the whole government of all Sigilia, and as some doe reports, for that he had taken a bribe of his enemies of twentie talentes for his labor to commit this murther. So he began to practife, to bribe, and to subborne certaine of the mercenarie fouldiers against Dion, and that by a maruelous craftie and futtle fetch. For, vling commonly to report vnto Dion certeine fe-Note the fin- ditious wordes, spoken peraduenture by the souldiers in deede, or else denised of his owne head : he wan such a libertie and boldnes by the trust Dion had in him, that he might fafely say what he would to any of the fouldiers, and boldly speake euil of Dion by his owne commaundement: to thend he might thereby understand the better whether any of the souldiers were angry with him, or wished his death. By this pollicy, Callippus straight foud out those that bare

Dion grudge, & that were already corrupted, whom he drew to his conspiracy. And if any man F

By chaunce sitting late one euening all alone, peared will in a gallerie he had, and being in a deepe thought with him felfe, fodainly he heard a noyfer and therewith casting his eye to thend of his gallery, (being yet day light) he saw a monstrous great woman, like vnto one of the furies shewed in playes, and saw her sweeping of the house with a broome. This vision so amazed and affrighted him, that he sent for his frends, and told them what a fight he had seene : and prayed them to tarie with him all night, being as it were a man befide him felfe, fearing leaft the spirite woulde come to him againe if they left him alone, of the which not with standing he neuer heard more afterwards. Howbeit shortly after, The lumenhis fonne being growen to mans state, for a certaine light anger he had taken when he was table death of B but a boy, he cast him selfe hedlong downe from the toppe of the house, and so was slaine. Dion being in this state, Callippus went on still with his treason, and spred a rumor abroade among the Syracus ans, that Dion feeing him felfe nowe destitute of children, was determined to fend for Apollocrates, Dionysius sonne, to make him his heire and successor, being cosin Apollocrates germaine to his wife, and his fifters daughters fonne. Then began Dion, his wife, and fifter to Diony fine mistrust Callippus practises, and they were told of it by divers sundrie and manifest proofes. But

Dion being forie(as I suppose) for Heraclides death, and inwardlie taking that murther in very euill part, as a fowle blot to his life and doings: he fayd he had rather dye a thowfand deaths, and to offer his throate to be cut to any that would, rather then he would live in that miferie. to be compelled to take heede as well of his frends, as of his enemies. Callippus then feeing the women to buste and inquisitive of his doings, & fearing least he should be bewrayed; he came weeping vnto them, and told them it was nothing, and that he was readie to affure them of it by any maner of way they would deuise. The women then willed him to sweare by the great othe, which was in this maner. He that must take this othe, commeth into the temple of the The great oth goddeffes The smooth ores, which are Ceres and Proferpina. And after certaine facrifices done he of the sme. putteth on the purple chaplet of the goddesse Proferpina, holding a burning torch in his hand cusant. and sweareth in this maner. Nowe, I doe not Dionflaine D thinke that he chose that day of sette purpose, knowing right well that he did alwayes sinne a- by Callippus gainst her, what time soeuer he had killed his brother, being by his meanes speciallie admitted to the focietie and brotherhoode with him, of the fraternity and misteries of Ceres & Proferpina. Of this conspiracie there were divers. For as Dion was set in his chamber talking with his frends where there were many beddes to fit on: fome compassed the house round about. others came to the dores and windowes of his chamber, and they that should doe the deede to dispatche him, which were the ZACYNTHIAN souldiers, came into his chamber in their

dores after them, and locked them in, least any man shoulde come out: and they that were within, fell vpon Dion, and thought to haue strangled him. But when they saw they could not. p they called for a sworde. Neuer a man that was within, durst open the dores, though there were many with Dion. For they thought enery man to faue their owne lines, by fuffering him to be killed, and therefore durft not come to helpe him. So the murtherers taried a long time within, and did nothing. At length there was one Lycon a Syracysan, that gaue one of these ZACYNTHIAN fouldiers a dagger in at the window, with the which they cut Dions throate.as a weather they had holden a long time in their handes, euen dead for feare. The murther being executed, they cast his fifter, and wife, great with childe, into prison, and there the poore Ladie was pitiefullie brought to bedde of a goodly boy: the which they rather determined to Dions wife bring vp, then otherwise to doe any thing with the childe. therefore, in my opinion, it was not cuill spoken, that ATHENS is a citie of all other that A bringeth forth the best men when they geue them selues to goodnes, & the wickedest people alfo, when they doe dispose them selues to euill : as their contrie also bringeth foorth the best honnie that is, and hemlocke in like maner that quickely dispatcheth a man of his life. Howbeit the gods, and fortune, did not fuffer this treason and wicked man to raigne long, having comen to the government of a realme by fo damnable a murther: but shortly after they gave him his payment he had deserved. he lost the citie of Syracysa: whereupon he fayd that he had lost a citie, and got a * cheefeknife. Afterwards he went to affaile the MESSENIANS, and there he loft a great number of his knifets frage men, and amongest them were slaine those that killed Dion. Now Callippus finding no citie in or cut cheefe, all Sicilia, that woulde receive him, but that they all did hate and abhorre him: he went to B take the citie of RHEGIO in ITALIE. There being in great distresse and neede of all thinges, marker, Indian and not able to maintaine his fouldiers: he was flaine by Leptines, and Polyperchon, with the Pollux. lib. 10 felfe same dagger wherewith Dion before was slaine: the which was known by the facion, being short after the LACONIAN daggers, and also by the workemanshippe vpon it, that was very excellently wrought. And thus was the end and death of Callippus. Now for Aristomaché and Areta, they were taken out of prison : and Icetes SYRACYSAN, that somtimes had bene one of Dions frends, tooke them home to his owne house, and vied them verie well and faithfully for a certaine time, but afterwards was wonne and corrupted by Dions enemies. So he caused a shippe to be provided for them, and bare them in hande that he would sende them into P s-LOPONNES VS: but he gaue them charge that caried them away, to kill them as they went, and C to throw them ouer bord into the fea. Some fay, that the two women, and the litle young boy, were cast aliue into the sea. But this reward of the sinfull act that he committed, returned againe vppon him felfe, as it had done before vnto others. For he was taken by Timoleon that put him to death: and besides, the SYRACVSANS did also kill two of his daughters in reuenge of the vnfaithfulnes he had shewed vnto Dion.

Arcus Brutus came of that Junius Brutus, for whome the auncient Ro-MANES made his statue of brasse to be set up in the Capitoll, with the images of the kings, holding a naked fword in his hand: bicause he had valliantly put downe the TARQVINES from their kingdom of Rome. But that Junius Brutus being of a fower stearne nature, not softned by The pareinge reason, being like vnto sword blades of too hard a temper: was so subiect to his choller and malice he bare vnto the tyrannes, that for their lect to his choller and mance he batter has the sale of the fakes he caused his owne some to be executed. But this Mayeus Bru-

B wit, which was gentle and constant, in attempting of great things: me thinkes he was rightly made and framed vnto vertue. So that his verie enemies which wish him most hurt, bicause of his conspiracy against Iulius Casar: if there were any noble attempt done in all this conspiracie, they referre it whollie vnto Brutus, and all the cruell and violent actes vnto Cassius, who was Brutus familiar frend, but not fo well geuen, and condicioned as he. His mother Seruilia, Seruilia M. it is thought came of the blood of Seruilius Hala, who, when Spurius Melius went about to make him felfe king, and to bring it to passe had entifed the common people to rebell: tooke a dagger and hid it close under his arme, and went into the market place. When he was come thither, he made as though he had fomewhat to fay vnto him, and preffed as neere him as he

C stabbed him in with his dagger, and slue him. Thus muche all writers agree for his mother. Now touching his father, some for the euil wil & malice they bare vnto Brutus, bicause of the Brutus parent death of Iulius Cafar, doe maintaine that he came not of Iunius Brutus that draue out the TAR- 14ge by his QVINES: for there were none left of his race, confidering that his two fonnes were executed father. for conspiracie with the TARQVINES: and that Marcin Brutin came of a meane house, the which was raifed to honor and office in the common wealth, but of late time. Posidonius the Philosopher wryteth the contrarie, that Iunius Brutus in deede flue two of his sonnes which

furthermore, that there were in his time certeine famous men of that familie, whose stature and countenaunce resembled much the image of Junius Brutus. And thus much for this matter. Marcus Cato the Philosopher was brother vnto Seruilsa M. Brutus mother; whom Brutus

haued him felfe so honestlie and carefullie, that Cate did greatly commende him : and after all the goodes were fold and converted into readie money, he tooke the most parte of it, and returned withall to Rome. Afterwards when the Empire of Rome was deuided into factions, and that Cefar and Pompey both were in armes one against the other, and that all the Empire of Rome was in garboyle and vorore: it was thought then that Brutus woulde take parte with Cafar, bicause Pompey not long before had put his father vnto death. But Brutus preferring the E respect of his contrie and common wealth, before private affection, and perswading himselse Trainstaleth that Pompey had juster cause to enter into armes then Casar: he then tooke parte with Pompey, though oftentimes meting him before, he thought fcorne to speake to him, thinking it a great finne and offence in him, to speake to the murtherer of his father. But then submitting him felfe vnto Pompey, as vnto the head of the common wealth: he failed into Sicilia, Lieutenant under Sestius that was Gouernor of that province. But when he saw that there was no way to rife, nor to do any noble exployts, and that Cafar & Pompey were both camped together, and fought for victory:he went of him selfe vnsent for into MACEDON, to be partaker of the daunger. It is reported that Fompey being glad, and wondering at his comming when he fawe him come to him : he role out of his chaire, and went and imbraced him before them all, and vied F Econo exer- him as honorablie, as he could have done the noblest man that tooke his parte. Brutus being in Pompeys campe, did nothing but studie all day long, except he were with Pompey, & not only

A the dayes before, but the felfe fame day also before the great battell was fought in the fieldes of PHARSALIA, where Pompey was ouerthrowen. It was in the middeft of fommer, and the funne was verie hotte, besides that the campe was lodged neere vnto marishes, and they that caried his tent, taried long before they came: whereuppon, being verie wearie with travell, fcant any meate came into his mouth at dinner time. Furthermore, when others flept, or thought what woulde happen the morrowe after: he fell to his booke, and wrote all day long British findied till night, wryting a breularie of Polybius. It is reported that Cefar did not forgette him, and in Poinpeis that he gaue his Captaines charge before the battell, that they shoulde beware they killed Indiac Caffa not Brutus in fight, and if he yeelded willinglie vnto them, that then they shoulde bring him careful of vnto him : but if he resisted, and woulde not be taken, then that they shoulde lette him goe, Briting forp. R and doe him no hurte. Some faye he did this for Seruiliaes fake, Brutus mother. For when he was a young man, he had bene acquainted with Seruilia, who was extreamelie in loue with him. And bicause Brutus was borne in that time when their loue was hottest, he per- wind cafer fwaded him felfe that he begat him. For proofe hereof the reporte goeth, that when the loued Strait waightiest matters were in hande in the Senate, about the conspiracie of Catiline, which matters was likelie to haue vndone the citie of Rome, Cafar and Cato fate neere together, and were both of contrarie mindes to eache other: and then, that in the meane time one deliuered Cafar a letter. Cafar tooke it, and red it foftlie to him felfe: but Cato cried out vpon Cafar, and fayd he did not well to receive advertisementes from enemies. Whereuppon the whole Senate beganne to murmure atit. Then Cafar gaue Cato the letter as it was fent him, who red rit, and founde that it was a loue letter fent from his fifter Seruilia: thereuppon he caft itagaine to Casar, and sayde vnto him, holde, dronken soppe. When he had done so, he went on with his tale, and maintayned his opinion as he did before: fo commonlie was the love of Seruilia knowen which she bare vnto Casar. So, after Pompeys ouerthrowe at the battell of PHARSALIA, and that he fledde to the fea: when Cafar came to befeege his campe, Brutus went out of the campe gates vnseene of any man, and lept into a marishe full of water and reedes. Then when night was come, he crept out, and went vnto the citie of LAR ISs A: from whence he wrote vnto Cafar, who was verie glad that he had scaped, and sent for him to come vnto him. When Brutus was come, he did not onelie pardon him, but also Brutus faute kept him alwayes about him, and did as muche honor and efteeme him, any man he had in by India Ce-D his companie. Nowe no man coulde tell whether Pompey was fledde, and all were maruelous desirous to knowe it: wherefore Casar walking a good waye alone with Brutto, he did Phasaille. aske him which way he thought Pomper tooke. Cafar perceiving by his talke that Brutus gefsed certainlie whether Pompey shoulde be fledde: he left all other wayes, and tooke his iorney directlie towardes ÆGYPT. Pompey, as Brutus had coniectured, was in deede fledde into ÆGYPT, but there he was villanouslie slayne. Furthermore, Brutus obteyned pardon of Ca- * This king far for Cassius: and defending also the king * of LYBIAES cause, he was ourrlayed with a was lubar worlde of accusacions against him, howebeit intreating for him, he saued him the best parte me allo, that of his realme and kingdome. They fay also that Cafar fayd, when he hearde Brutus pleade: I Brusus made knowenot, sayd he, what this young man woulde, but what he woulde, he willeth it vehefor Deissams

E mentlie. For as Brutus granetie and constant minde wouldenot grannt all men their requests king of Galathat fued vnto him, but being moued with reason and discretion, did alwayes encline to that the who was which was good and honest: euen so when it was moued to followe any matter, he vsed a whishanding kinde of forcible and vehement perswasion that calmed not, till he had obteyned his desire. of the most For by flattering of him, a man coulde neuer obteyne any thing at his handes, nor make him parts of his to doe that which was vniust. Further, he thought it not meete for a man of calling and e- cafer and stimacion, to yeelde vnto the requestes and intreaties of a shamelesse and importunate su-three sorts as the state of the ter, requesting thinges vnmeete: the which notwithstanding, some men doe for shame, bi-placewere beff

fed him best to see, were the cities vader Brutus charge and government, and Brutus him felfe: who honored Cafar in person, and whose companie also Cafar greatlie esteemed. Now there were divers fortes of Prætorshippes at Rome, and it was looked for, that Brutus or Cassim would make fute for the chiefest Prætorshippe, which they called the Prætorshippe of the citie: bicause he that had that office, was as a Judge to minister justice vnto the citizens, Therfore they strong one against the other, though some say that there was some little grudge Rrutus and Casius conbetween them for other matters before, and that this contencion did fette them further out, send for the though they were allyed together. For Cassim had maried Junia, Brutus fifter. Others say, that B Pretor hip this contencion between them came by Cafar himselfe, who secretly gaue either of them both hope of his fauour. So their fute for the Pratorshippe was so followed and laboured of either Iunia, Brutus partie, that one of them put an other in fute of lawe. Brutus with his vertue and good name contended against many noble exploytes in armes, which Casius had done against the Par-THIANS, So Cafar after he had heard both their objections, he told his frendes with whom he consulted about this matter: Cassius cause is the inster, fayd he, but Brutus must be first preferred. Thus Brutus had the first Prætorshippe, and Cassius the second: who thanked not Casar so much for the Prætorshippe he had, as he was angrie with him for that he had lost, But Brutus in many other thinges talted of the benefite of Cafars fauour in any thing he requested. For gainst Casar. if he had lifted, he might have bene one of Cafars chiefest frendes, and of greatest authoritie C and credit about him. Howebeit Cassius frendes did dissiwade him from it (for Cassius and he were not vet reconciled together fithence their first contencion and strife for the Prætorship)

which they favd Cafar gaue him, not to honor his vertue, but to weaken his conftant minde, framing it to the bent of his bowe. Now Calar on the other fide did not trust him ouermuch. nor was not without tales brought vnto him against him: howbeit he feared his great minde, authority, & frends. Yet on the other fide also, he trusted his good nature, & fayer condicions. For, intelligence being brought him one day, that Antonius and Dolabella did conspire against him: he auniwered, that there fat long heared men made him not affrayed, but the leane and whitely faced fellowes, meaning that, by Brutus and Cassius. At an other time also when one D accused Brutus vnto him, and bad him beware of him: What, sayd he againe, clapping his e-fart fajing hand on his brest: thinke ye that Brutus will not tarie till this bodie dye? Meaning that none but Brutus after him was meete to have suche power as he had. And surelie, in my opinion, I am perswaded that Brutus might in dede have come to have bene the chiefest man of Rome, if he could have contented him felfe for a time to have bene next vnto Calar, & to have suffred his glorie and authoritie, which he had gotten by his great victories, to confume with time. But Cassus being a chollericke man, and hating Casar privatile, more then he did the tyrannie ocassiminen- penlie: he incensed Brutus against him. It is also reported, that Brutus coulde cuill away with

he had done him, and amongest others, for that he had taken away his Lyons from him. Cas- E fius had provided them for his sportes, when he should be Ædilis, and they were found in the Caffine Lione Citie of MEGARA, when it was wonne by Calenus, and Cafar kept them. The rumor went, that these Lyons did maruelous great hurt to the MAGARIANS. For when the citie was taken, they brake their cages where they were tied up, and turned them loofe, thinking they would have done great mischiese to the enemies, and have kept them from setting vppon them; but the Lyons contrarie to expectacion, turned vpon them selues that fled vnarmed, & did so cruelly tare some in peces, that it pitied their enemies to see them. And this was the cause, as some do Castim an e- report, that made Cassims conspire against Casar. But this holdeth no water. For Cassims even fro his cradell could not abide any maner of tyrans, as it appeared when he was but a boy, & went vnto the same schoole that Faustus, the sonne of Sylla did. And Faustus bragging among other F boyes, highly boafted of his fathers kingdom: Caffius rofe vp on his feete, and gaue him two good whirts on the eare. Faultus gouernors would have put this matter in fute against Cassius:

A But Pompey woulde not fuffer them, but caused the two boyes to be brought before him, and asked them howe the matter came to passe. Then Cassus, as it is wrytten of him, fayd vnto the other: goe to Faustus, speake againe and thou darest, before this noble man here, the fame wordes that made me angrie with thee, that my fiftes may walke once againe about thine eares. Suche was Casius hotte stirring nature. But for Brutus, his frendes and contrie How Brutus men, both by divers procurementes, and fundrie rumors of the cirie, and by many bills alfo, was incenfed did openlie call and procure him to doe that he did For worder the image of his gainft calm.

did openlie call and procure him to doe that he did. For, under the image of his auncester Innius Brutus, that draue the kinges out of Rome, they wrote: O, that it pleased the goddes thou wert nowe aliue, Brutus: and againe, that thou wert here amonge vs nowe. His tribunall (or chaire) where he gaue audience duringe the time he was Prætor, was full of suche B billes: Brutus, thou art a fleepe, and art not Brutus in deede. And of all this, Cefars flatterers were the cause: who beside many other exceeding and vnspeakeable honors they davly deuifed for him, in the night time they did put Diadeames vppon the heades of his images, supposinge thereby to allure the common people to call him kinge, insteade of Dictator. Howebeit it turned to the contrarie, as we have wrytten more at large in Iulius Calars life. Nowe when Cassus felt his frendes, and did stirre them yp against Casar: they all agreed and promised to take parte with him, so Brutus were the chiefe of their conspiracie. For they told him, that so high an enterprise and attempt as that, did not so muche require men of manhoode, and courage to drawe their swordes: as it stoode them vppon to haue a man of suche estimacion as Brutus, to make euerie man boldlie thinke, that by his onelie presence the fact c were holie, and just. If he tooke not this course, then that they should goe to it with fainter hartes, and when they had done it, they shoulde be more searefull: bicause euerie man woulde thinke that Brutus woulde not have refused to have made one with them, if the cause had bene good and honest. Therefore Cassus confidering this matter with him selfe, did first of all speake to Brutus, since they grewe straunge together for the sute they had for the Præ- cassimpraints torshippe. So when he was reconciled to him againe, and that they had imbraced one an o- Braum first, to ther: Cassius asked him if he were determined to be in the Senate house, the first day of the put downs the moneth of Marche, bicause he heard say that Casars frendes shoulde mouethe counsell that gran. day, that Cafar shoulde be called king by the Senate. Brutus aunswered him, he would not be there. But if we be sent for sayd Cassus: howethen? For my selfe then sayd Brutus, I meane D not to holde my peace, but to withfrande it, and rather dye then lofe my libertie. Castius being bolde, and taking holde of this worde: why, & he, what ROMANE is he aliue that will fuffer thee to dye for the libertie? What, knowest thou not that thou art Brutus? Thinkest thou that they be cobblers, tapsters, or such elike base mechanicall people, that wryte these billes and scrowles which are founde dayly in thy Prætors chaire, and not the noblest men and best citizens that doe it? No, be thou well affured, that of other Prætors they looke for giftes, common distribucions amongest the people, and for common playes, and to see fensers fight at the sharpe, to shew the people passime: but at thy handes, they specially require(as a due det vnto them) the taking away of the tyranny, being fully bent to fuffer any extremity for thy fake, fo that thou wilt shew thy selfe to be the man thou art taken for, and that they hope thou art, E Thereuppon he kiffed Brutus, and imbraced him: and so each taking leaue of other, they went both to speake with their frendes about it. Nowe amongest Pompeys frendes, there was

was offended with him for that he was brought in daunger by his tyrannicall power. And Brutte matherefore in his hearte he was alway his mortall enemie, and was besides verie familiar keib Ligarius with Brutus, who went to fee him beinge ficke in his bedde, and fayed vnto him : O Liga- one of the corius, in what a time art thou sicke & Ligarius risinge vppe in his bedde, and taking him by the right hande, fayed vnto him: Brutus, fayed he, if thou hast any great enterprise in hande worthie of thy felfe, I am whole. After that time they beganne to feele all their acquaintaunce whome they trusted, and layed their heades together consultinge vppon it, and did not onelie picke out their frendes, but all those also whome they thought flowt enough to attempt any desperate matter, and that were not affrayed to loase their lives, ÝVVV one called * Caius Ligarius, who had bene accused vnto Cesar for taking parte with Pompey, * In an other and Cafar discharged him. But Ligarius thanked not Cafar so muche for his discharge, as he place they cal

They do bide For this cause they durst not acquaint Cicero with their conspiracie, although he was a man A whome they loued dearelie, and trusted best: for they were affrayed that he being a coward by nature, and age also having increased his feare, he woulde quite turne and after all their purpose, and quenche the heate of their enterprise, the which speciallie required hotte and earnest execucion, seeking by perswasion to bring all thinges to suche safetie, as there should be no perill. Brutus also did let other of his frendes alone, as Statilius Epic vrian, and Faonius, that made profession to followe Marcus Cato. Bicause that having cast out wordes 2 farre of, disputing together in Philosophie to feele their mindes: Faonius aunswered, that civill warre was worse then tyrannicall government vsurped against the lawe. And Statilius worse then to tolde him also, that it were an vnwise parte of him, to put his life in daunger, for a sight of ignoraunt fooles and affes. Labeo was present at this talke, and maintayned the contra-R rie against them both. But Brutus helde his peace, as though it had bene a doubtfull matter, and a harde thing to have decided. But afterwardes, being out of their companie, he made Labeo priuie to his intent : who verie readilie offered him felfe to make one. And they thought good also to bring in an other Brutus to ioyne with him, surnamed Albinus: who was no man of his handes him felfe, but bicause he was able to bring good force of a great number of slaues, and fensers at the sharpe, whome he kept to shewe the people pastime with their fighting, befides also that Cafar had some trust in him. Cassius and Labeo tolde Brutus Albinus of it at the first, but he made them no aunswere. But when he had spoken with

Brutus him felfe alone, and that Brutus had tolde him he was the chiefe ringleader of all this conspiracie: then he willinglie promised him the best aide he coulde. Furthermore, the on- C lie name and great calling of Brutus, did bring on the most of them to geue consent to this conspiracie. Who having neuer taken othes together, nor taken or genen any caution or full faith and affuraunce, nor binding them felues one to an other by any religious othes: they all kept the matter so secret to them selues, and coulde so cunninglie handleit, that notwithstanding the goddes did reueale it by manifest signes and tokens from aboue, and by predictions of facrifices: yet all this woulde not be beleued. Nowe Brutus, who knewe veriewell that for his fake all the noblest, valliantest, and most couragious men of Rome did venter their liues, waying with him felfe the greatnesse of the daunger: when he was out of his house, he did so frame and facion his countenaunce and lookes, that no man coulde discerne he had any thing to trouble his minde. But when night came that he was in his owne house, then he D was cleane chaunged. For, either care did wake him against his will when he woulde haue flept, or else oftentimes of him selse he fell into suche deepe thoughtes of this enterprise, cafting in his minde all the daungers that might happen: that his wife lying by him, founde that there was some maruelous great matter that troubled his minde, not beinge wont to be in that taking, and that he coulde not well determine with him felfe. His wife Porcia (as we have tolde you before) was the daughter of Cato, whome Brutus maried being his cosin, not a maiden, but a youngewidowe after the death of her first husbande Bibulus, by Bibulus booke whome the had also a younge sonne called Bibulus, who afterwardes wrote a booke of the actes and leastes of Brutus, extant at this present day. This young Ladie being excellentlie well seene in Philosophie, louing her husbande well, and being of a noble courage, as she E was also wise: bicause she woulde not aske her husbande what he ayled before she had to congest made some proofe by her selfe, she tooke a little rasor suche as barbers occupie to pare mens nayles, and causinge all her maydes and women to goe out of her chamber, gaue her felfe a greate gashe withall in her thigh, that she was straight all of a goare bloode, and incontinentlie after, a vehement feuer tooke her, by reason of the payne of her wounde. Then perceiuing her husbande was maruelouslie out of quiet, and that he coulde take no rest: euen in her greatest payne of all, she spake in this sorte vnto him. I being . O Brutus. (fayed the) the daughter of Cato, was maried vnto thee, not to be thy beddefellowe and companion in bedde and at borde onelie, like a harlot: but to be partaker also with thee, of thy good and cuill fortune. Nowe for thy felfe, I can finde no cause of faulte in thee tou- p chinge our matche: but for my parte, howe may I showe my duetie towardes thee, and howe muche I woulde doe for thy fake, if I can not constantlie beare a secret mischaunce

A or griefe with thee, which require th secrecy and fidelity? I confesse, that a womans wit commonly is too weake to keepe a fecret fafely: but yet, Brutus, good educacion, and the companie of vertuous men, haue some power to reforme the detect of nature. And for my selfe. I " haue this benefit moreouer: that I am the daughter of Cato, & wife of Brutus. This not withftanding. I did not trust to any of these things before: vntill that now I have found by experience, that no paine nor griefe what soeuer can ouercome me. With those wordes she shewed him ,, her wounde on her thigh, and tolde him what she had done to proue her felfe. Brutus was 2- >> mazed to heare what the fayd vnto him, and lifting vp his handes to heaten, he befought the goddes to geue him the grace he might bring his enterprise to so good passe, that he might be founde a husband, worthie of so noble a wife as Porcia; so he then did comfort her the best

B he coulde. Now a day being appointed for the meeting of the Senate, at what time they hoped Cafar woulde not faile to come: the conspirators determined then to put their enterprise in execucion, bicause they might meete safelie at that time without suspicion, and the rather, for that all the noblest and chiefest men of the citie woulde be there. Who when they should see suche a great matter executed, would euerie man then set to their handes, for the defence of their libertie. Furthermore, they thought also that the appointment of the place where the counsell shoulde be kept, was chosen of purpose by divine providence, and made all for them. For it was one of the porches about the Theater, in the which there was a certaine place full of seates for men to sit in, where also was set up the image of Pompey, which the citie had made and confectated in honor of him: when he did beautifie that parte of the citie with the Theater he built, with divers porches about it. In this place was the affembly of the Senate appointed to be, iust on the fifteenth day of the moneth of March, which the Ro-MANES call, Idus Martias: fo that it seemed some god of purpose had brought Casar thither to beflaine, for reuenge of Pompeys death. So when the day was come, Brutus went out of his house with a dagger by his side under his long gowne, that no bodie sawe nor knewe, but his wife onelie. The other conspirators were all affembled at Cassius house, to bring his sonne into the market place, who on that day did put on the mans gowne, called Toga Virilist and from thence they came all in a troupe together vnto Pompeys porche, looking that Cafar woulde straight come thither. But here is to be noted, the wonderfull affured constance of The worderthese conspirators, in so daungerous and waightie an enterprise as they had vndertaken. For of the constitution of the constit D many of them being Praetors, by reason of their office, whose duetie is to minister justice to rators, in kileuerie bodie : they did not onelie with great quietnesse and curtesse heare them that spake yn- ling of cesar. to them, or that pleaded matters before them, and gaue them attentine eare, as if they had had no other matter in their heades: but moreouer, they gave just sentence, and carefullie dispatched the causes before them. So there was one among them, who being condemned in a certaine summe of money, refused to pay it, and cried out that he did appeale vnto Cafar. Then Brutus casting his eyes uppon the conspirators, sayd, Cafar shall not lette me to fee the lawe executed. Notwithstanding this, by chaunce there fell out many misfortunes vnto Sundrie mitthe lawe executed Notwith tanding tins, by channel the the first and chiefest was, Cafars long fortunes to them, which was enough to have marred the enterprise. The first and chiefest was, Cafars long have broken tarying, who came verie late to the Senate: for bicause the signes of the sacrifices appeared of the emer-E valuckie, his wife Calpurnia kept him at home, and the Soothfayers bad him beware he went profes not abroade. The seconde cause was, when one came vnto Casea being a conspirator, and taking him by the hande, fayd vnto him: O Casca, thou keptest it close from me, but Brutus hath tolde me all. Cafea being amazed at it, the other went on with his tale, and fayd: why, howe nowe, howe commeth it to passe thou art thus riche, that thou doest sue to be Ædilis? Thus Casca being deceived by the others doubtfull wordes, he tolde them it was a thowsand to one, he blabbed not out all the conspiracie. An other Senator called Popilius Lana, after he had faluted Brutus and Cassius more frendlie then he was wont to doe: he rounded softlie in their eares, and told them, I pray the goddes you may goe through with that you have taken in hande, but withall, dispatche I reade you, for your enterprise is bewrayed. When he had F fayd, he presentlie departed from them, and left them both affrayed that their conspiracie woulde out. Nowe in the meane time, there came one of Brutus men post hast vnto him, and tolde him his wife was a dying. For Porcia being verie carefull and penfine for that which

The meaker was to come, and being too weake to away with so great and inward griefe of minde: she A nes of Porcie, coulde hardlie keepe within, but was frighted with euerie litle noyse and crieshe hearde, as ding her for. those that are taken and possess with the furie of the Bacchantes, asking euery man that came from the market place, what Brutus did, and still fent messenger after messenger, to knowe what newes. At length, Casars comming being prolonged as you have heard, Porciaes weakeneffe was not able to holde out any lenger, and thereuppon the fodainlie fwounded, that the had no leasure to goe to her chamber, but was taken in the middest of her house, where her speache and sences failed her. Howbeit she soone came to her selfe againe, and so was layed in her bedde, and tended by her women. When Brutus heard these newes, it grieued him, as it is to be presupposed: yet he left not of the care of his contrie and common wealth, neither went home to his house for any newes he heard. Nowe, it was reported that Casar was B comming in his litter: for he determined not to stay in the Senate all that day (bicause he was affrayed of the valuckie fignes of the facrifices) but to adiorne matters of importaunce vnto the next fession and counsell holden, faining him selfe not to be well at ease. When Cafar came out of his litter: Popilius Lana, that had talked before with Brutus and Cassius, and had prayed the goddes they might bring this enterprise to passe: went vnto Casar, and kept him a long time with a talke. Cafar gaue good eare vnto him. Wherefore the conspirators (if so they shoulde be called) not hearing what he sayd to Cafar, but coniecturing by that he had tolde them a litle before, that his talke was none other but the verie discouerie of their conspiracie: they were affrayed euerie man of them, and one looking in an others face, it was easie to see that they all were of a minde, that it was no tarying for them till they were C apprehended, but rather that they should kill them selues with their owne hands. And when Cassius and certaine other clapped their handes on their fwordes vnder their gownes to draw them: Brutus marking the countenaunce and gesture of Lana, and considering that he did vse him selie rather like an humble and earnest suter, then like an accuser: he sayd nothing to his companion (bicause there were many amongest them that were not of the conspiracie) but with a pleasaunt countenaunce encouraged Cassius. And immediatlie after, Lana went from Cafar, and kiffed his hande: which shewed plainlie that it was for some matter concerning him selfe, that he had held him so long in talke. Nowe all the Senators being entred first into this place or chapter house where the counsell should be kept: all the other conspirators ftraight ftoode about Cefars chaire, as if they had had fome thing to haue fayd vnto him. And D fome fay, that Cassius calting his eyes voon Pompeys image, made his prayer vnto it, as if it had bene aliue. * Trebonius on thother fide, drewe Antonius atofide, as he came into the house where the Senate fate, and helde him with a long talke without. When Cafar was come into Brause Albi- the house, all the Senate rose to honor him at his comming in. So when he was set, the con-"", that kept fpirators flocked about him, & amongst them they presented one * Tullius Cimber, who made humble fute for the calling home againe of his brother that was banished. They all made as though they were interceffors for him, and tooke him by the handes, and kiffed his head and breft. Cafar at the first, simplie refused their kindnesse and intreaties: but afterwardes, perceiuing they still pressed on him, he violently thrust them from him. Then Cimber with both his hands plucked Cafars gowne ouer his shoulders, and Cafea that stoode behinde him, drew his E dagger first, and strake Casar vpon the shoulder, but gaue him no great wound. Casar feeling cestes, the fifth him selfe hurt, tooke him straight by the hande he held his dagger in, and cried out in Latin: O traitor, Casca, what doest thou? Casca on thother side cried in Græke, and called his brother to helpe him. So divers running on a heape together to flie vppon Casar, he looking about him to haue fledde, fawe Brutus with a fworde drawen in his hande readie to strike at him: then he let Cascaes hande goe, and casting his gowne ouer his face, suffered euerie man to strike at him that woulde. Then the conspirators thronging one vpon an other bicause euerie man was desirous to haue a cut at him, so many swords and daggers lighting vpon one bodie, one of them hurte an other, and among them Brutus caught a blowe on his hande, bicause he would make one in murdering of him, and all the rest also were every man of them P bloudied. Cafar being flaine in this maner, Brutus flanding in the middeft of the house, would haue spoken, and stayed the other Senators that were not of the conspiracie, to haue tolde

A them the reason why they had done this facte. But they as men both affrayd and amazed. fled one vpon anothers necke in hafte to get out at the dore, and no man followed them. For it was fet downe, and agreed betwene them, that they should kill no man but Cafar onely, and should intreate all the rest to looke to defend their libertie. All the conspirators, but Brutus, determining vpon this matter, thought it good also to kill Antonius, bicause he was a wicked man, and that in nature fauored tyranny: besides also, for that he was in great estimation with fouldiers, having bene conversant of long time amongest them; and specially, having a mind bent to great enterprises, he was also of great authoritie at that time, being Conful with Cafar. But Brutus would not agree to it. First, for that he fayd it was not honest: secondly, bicause niw was not he told them there was hope of chaunge in him. For he did not miltrust, but that Antonius be. staying with

B ing a noble minded and coragious man (when he should knowe that Cafar was dead) would cafar. willingly helpe his contry to recouer her libertie, having them an example vnto him to follow their corage and vertue. So Brutus by this meanes faued Antonius life, who at that prefent time disguised him selfe, and stale away. But Brutus & his consorts, having their swords bloudy in their handes, went straight to the Capitoll, perswading the ROMANES as they went to Brusha with take their libertie againe. Now, at the first time when the murther was newly done, there were went unto fodaine outcryes of people that ranne vp & downe the citie, the which in deede did the more the Capitolle increase the feare and tumult. But when they saw they slue no man, nether did spoyle or make hauock of any thing: then certaine of the Senators, & many of the people imboldening them felues, went to the Capitoll vnto them. There a great number of men being affembled toge-

All those that were by, sayd they had done well, and cryed vnto them that they should boldly come downe from the Capitoll. Whereuppon, Brutus and his companions came boldly downe into the market place. The rest followed in trowpe, but Brutus went formost, very honorably compassed in round about with the noblest men of the citie, which brought him from the Capitoll, thorough the market place, to the pulpit for orations. When the people faw him in the pulpit, although they were a multitude of rakehells of all forces, and had a good will to make fome fturre: yet being ashamed to doeit for thereuerence they bare vnto Brutus, they kept filence, to heare what he would fay. When Brutus began to speake, they gaue him quiet audience: howbeit immediatly after, they shewed that they were not all contented with the murther. For when another called Cinna would have spoken, and began to accuse Casar: they fell into a great vprore among them, and marueloufly reuiled him. Then the next morning the Senate being affembled, and holden within the temple of the goddesse Tellus, to wete the earth: and Antonius, Planeus, and Cicero, having made a motion to the Senate in that affembly, that they should take an order to pardon and forget all that was past, and to stablishe friendship and peace againe: it was decreed, that they should not onely be pardoned, but also that the Consuls should referre it to the Senate what honors F should be approved veto them. But Brutus went with the motion,& agreed vnto it: wherein it feemeth he committed a fecond fault. For the first fault he did was, when he would not confent to his fellow conspirators, that Antonius should be slavne: And therefore he was justly accused, that thereby he had faued and strengthened a stronge & grieuous enemy of their conspiracy. The second fault was, when he agreed that Casars funeralls thould be as Antonius would have them: the which in deede marred all. For first of all, when Cafars testament was openly red among them, whereby it appeared that he bequeathed vnto euery Citizen of Rome, 75. Drachmas a man, and that he left his gardens and arbors vnto the people, which he had on this side of the river of Tyber, in the place where now the temple of Fortune is built: the people then loued him, and were maruelous fory for him. B Afterwards when Cafars body was brought into the market place, Antonius making his funerall oration in praise of the dead, according to the auncient custom of Rome, and perceiuing that his wordes moued the common people to compassion: he framed his eloquence to make their harts yerne the more, and taking Cafars gowne all bloudy in his hand, he layed it open to the fight of them all, hewing what a number of cuts and holes it had yoon it. Therewithall the people fell prefently into fuch a rage and mutinie, that there was no more order kept amongeft the common people. For fome of them cryed out, kill the murtherers; others plucked vp formes, tables, and stalles about the market place, as they had done before at the funeralls of Clodius, and having layed them all on a heape together, they fet them on fire, and thereuppon did put the bodye of Cafar, and burnt it in the middest of the most holy places. C And furthermore, when the fire was thoroughly kindled, some here, some there, tooke burning fire brands, and ranne with them to the murtherers houses that had killed him, to set them a fire. Howbeit the conspirators foreseeing the daunger before, had wisely prouided for them selues, and fled. But there was a Poet called Cinna, who had bene no partaker of the conspiracy, but was alway one of Casars chiefest friends: he dreamed the night before, that Cafar bad him to supper with him, and that he refusing to goe, Cafar was very importunate with him, and compelled him, so that at length he led him by the hand into a great darke place, where being maruelously affrayd, he was driven to follow him in spite of his hart. This dreame put him all night into a feuer, and yet notwithstanding, the next morning when he heard that they caried Cafars body to buriall, being ashamed not to accompany his funerals: D he went out of his house, and thrust him self into the prease of the common people that were in a great vprore. And bicause some one called him by his name, Cinna: the people thinking he had bene that Cinna, who in an oration he made had spoken very euill of Cefar, they falling vpon him in their rage, flue him outright in the market place. This made Brutus and his companions more affrayd, then any other thing, next vnto the chaunge of Antonius. Wherefore they got them out of Rome, and kept at the first in the citie of ANTIVM, hoping to returne againe to Rome, when the furie of the people were a litle affwaged. The which they hoped would be quickly, confidering that they had to deale with a fickle and vinconstant multitude, easye to be carried, and that the Senate stoode for them: who notwithstanding made no enquiery of them that had torne poore Cinna the Poet in peeces, but caused them to be fought E for and apprehended, that went with fire brands to fet fire of the conspirators houses. The people growing weary now of Antonius pride and infolency, who ruled all things in manner with absolute power: they desired that Brutus might return eagaine, and it was also looked for, that Brutto would come him felfe in person to playe the playes which were due to the people, by reason of his office of Prætorship. But Brutus understanding that many of Casars fouldiers which ferued vnder him in the warres, and that also had lands and houses given them in the cities where they lay, did lye in wayte for him to kill him, and that they dayly by fmall companies came by one and by one into Rome: he durst no more returne thither, but Brown plants yet the people had the pleasure and pastyme in his absence, to see the games and sportes he made them, which were fumptuouslie set foorth and furnished with all thinges necessarie, F sparing for no cost. For he had bought a great number of straunge beastes, of the which he would not geue one of them to any frende he had, but that they shoulde all be employed in

BRVTVS. 1064 A his games: and went him felfe as farre as BYZANTIVM, to speake to some players of comedies and Musitions that were there. And further he wrote vnto his friends for one Canutius an excellent player, that what soeuer they did, they should intreate him to play in these playes: For favd he it is no reason to compell any GRECIAN, vnles he will come of his owne good will. Moreouer he wrote also vnto Cicero, and earnestly prayed him in any case, to be at these playes. Now the state of Rome standing in these termes, there fell out an other chaunge and alteracion, when the younge man Octavius Cafar came to Rome. He was the sonne of Julius for comming Calars Nece, whome he had adopted for his sonne, and made his heire, by his last will and te- to Rome. stament. But when Iulius Cafar his adopted father was flayne, he was in the citie of Apollo-NIA, where he studied tarying for him, bicause he was determined to makewarre with the

B PARTHIANS: but when he heard the newes of his death, he returned against to Rome, where to begin to curry fauor with the common people, he first of all tooke vpon him his adopted fathers name, & made distribution among them of the money which his father had bequeathed ynto them. By this meanes he troubled Antonius forely, and by force of money, got a great number of his fathers fouldiers together, that had ferued in the warres with him. And Cicero him felfe, for the great malice he bare Antonius, did fauor his proceedings. But Brutus Brutus Primerepre-Citers him lette, for the great mance he bate 2months, that he feemed by his doinges not to rading part curteous bondage, fith by his words and writings he did commend this young man Octavius C Cafar, to be a good and gentle Lorde. For our predecessors sayde he, would never abyde to be fubiect to any Maisters, how gentle or mild soeuer they were: and for his owne part that he had never resolutely determined with him selfe to make warre, or peace, but otherwise, that he was certenly minded neuer to be flaue nor fubicet. And therefore he wondred much at him, how Cicero coulde be affrayd of the daunger of civill warres, and would not be affrayd of a shameful peace: and that to thrust Antonius out of the vsurped tyranny, in recompence he went about to stablishe younge Octavius Cafar tyranne. These were the contents of Brutus first letters he wrote vnto Cicero. Now the citie of Rome being deuided in two factions, some taking part with Antonius, other also leaning vnto Octavius Casar, and the souldiers making port fale of their feruice to him that would give most: Brutus feeing the state of Rome would D bevtterly ouerthrowen, he determined to goe out of ITALY, and went a foote through the contry of LVKE, vnto the citie of ELEA, standing by the sea. There Porcia being ready to de- Porciaes fopart from her husband Brutus, and to returne to Rome, did what the could to diffemble the remfull regriefe and forow the felt at her hart: But a certaine paynted table bewrayed her in the ende, for the ab although vntill that time the alwayes thewed a conftant and pacient mind. Andromache speaketh to this purpose in Homer: Thou Hector art my father, and my mother, and my brother, And husbandeke and in all: I mind not any other.

Then Brutus fmyling, aunswered againe: but yet (fayd he) I can not for my part fay vnto Porcia as Hector aunswered Andromache in the same place of the Poet:

For he fent Heroltratus into M ACEDON, to winne the Captaines and fouldiers that were youn those marches, & he did also enterteyne all the younge gentlemen of the Romanes, whome he founde in Athens studying Philosophie: amongest them he found Ciceroes fonne, whome he highly prayled and commended, faying, that whether he waked or flept, he found him of a noble mind and disposition, he did in nature so much hate tyrannes. Shortly after, he began to enter openly into armes: and being aduertifed that there came out of A si A a certaine fleete of R o M A N E flips that had good flore of money in them. and that the Captaine of those shippes (who was an honest man, and his famillier friende) B came towards ATHENS: he went to meete him as farre as the Ile of CARYSTOS, and having spoken with him there, he handled him so, that he was contented to leaue his shippes in his hands. Whereuppon he made him a notable banket at his house, bicause it was on his birth day. When the feast day came, & that they began to drinke lustely one to another: the ghests dranke to the victorie of Brutus, and the libertie of the ROMANES. Brutus therefore to encorage them further, called for a bigger cuppe, & holding it in his hand, before he dranke spake this alowd:

> My destiny and Phæbus are agreede. To bring me to my finall end with feede.

And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that the fame day he fought his last battell by the ci- C tie of Philippes, as he came out of his tent, he gaue his men for the word and signall of battell, Phabus: to that it was thought ever fince, that this his fodaine crying out at the feaft, was a prognostication of his misfortune that should happen. After this, Antistius gave him of the money he caried into ITALY, 50, Myriades. Furthermore, all Pompeys fouldiers that straggled vp and downe THESS ALY, came with very good will vnto him. He tooke from Cinna also, fine hundred horsemen, which he caried into As IA, vnto Dolabella. After that, he went by sea vnto the city of DEMETRIADE, and there tooke a great deale of armor and munition which was going to Antonius: and the which had bene made and forged there by Iulius Cafars commaundement, for the warres against the PARTHIANS. Furthermore, Hortensiae gouernor of MACEDON, did refigne the gouernment thereof vnto him. Besides, all the Princes, kings and D noble menthereabouts, came and joyned with him, when it was told him that Caius, (Antonius brother) comming out of ITALY, had passed the sea, & came with great speede towards the citie of DYRRACHIVM, and APOLLONIA, to get the fouldiers into his hands, which Gabinius had there. Brutus therefore to preuent him, went presently with a fewe of his men in the middest of winter when it snewe hard, and tooke his way thorough hard and sowle contries, and made such speede in deede, that he was there long before Antonius sumpters, that carried the vittells. So that when he came neare vnto Dyrkachivm, a disease tooke him which the Philitions call Beautia, to fay, a cormorant and vnfatiable appetite to eate: by reafon of the cold and paynes he had taken. This ficknes chaunceth often, both to men & beafts, that trauaile when it hath snowen: Either bicause the naturall heate being retyred into the E inward parts of the body, by the coldnes of the ayer hardening the skinne, doth straight difgest and consume the meate: or els bicause a sharpe suttell wind comming by reason of the fnow when it is molten, doth pearce into the body, and driveth out the naturall heate which was cast outward. For it seemeth, that the heate being quenched with the cold, which it meeteth withall comming out of the skinne of the body: causeth the sweates that follow the disfeafe. But hereof we have spoken at large in other places. Brutus being very faynt, and having nothing in his campe to eate: his fouldiers were compelled to goe to their enemies, & comming to the gates of the citie, they prayed the warders to helpe them to bread. When they heard in what case Brutus was, they brought him both meate and drinke: in requitall whereof, afterwards when he wanne the citie, he did not onely intreate and vie the Citizens there- F of curreoufly, but all the inhabitants of the citie also for their sakes. Now, when Caim Antoniwas arrived in the citie of Apollonia, he fent vnto the fouldiers thereabouts to come

A vnto him. But when he understoode that they went all to Brutus, and furthermore, that the Citizens of Aponionia did fauor him much: he then for fooke that citie, and went vnto the citie of Bythrotys, butyet he lost three of his enseignes by the way, that were flavne energy man of them. Then he fought by force to winne certaine places of strength about BYLLIS, &c to drive Brutus men from thence, that had taken it before: and therefore to obtayne his purpose he fought a battell with Cicero, the sonne of Marcus Tullius Cicero, by whome he was ouercome. For Brutus made the younger Cicero a Captaine, and did many notable exploytes by his seruice. Shortly after, having stolen vpon Caius Antonius in certein marishes farre from the place from whence he fled: he would not fet on him with furie, but onely road round about him, commaunding his fouldiers to spare him & his men, as reckoning them all his own R without stroke striking: and so in deede it hapned. For they yelded them selues, and their Captaine Antonius, vnto Brutus: fo that Brutus had now a great army about him. Now Brutus kept C. Amenius this Caius Antonius long time in his office, and neuer tooke from him the markes and fignes of Braum. his Consulthip, although many of his friends, & Cicero among others, wrote vnto him to put him to death. But when he sawe Antonius secretly practised with his Captaines to make some alteracion: then he fent him into a shippe, and made him to be kept there. When the souldiers whome C. Antonius had corrupted, were gotten into the citie of APOLLONIA, and fent from thence vnto Brutus to come vnto them: he made them aunswer, that it was not the maner of Romane Captaines to come to the fouldiers, but the fouldiers to come to the Captaine and to craue pardon for their offences committed. Thereuppon they came to him, and C he pardoned them. So Brutus preparing to goeinto Asia, newes came vnto him of the great chaunge at Rome. For Octanius Cafar was in armes, by commaundement and authoritie from the Senate, against Marcus Antonius. But after that he had driven Antonius out of IT ALY, the Senate then began to be affrayd of him: bicause he sued to be Consul, which was contrary to the law, and kept a great army about him, when the Empire of Rome had no neede of them. On the other fide, Octavius Cafar perceiuing the Senate stayed not there, but turned vnto Brutus that was out of ITALY, and that they appoynted him the government of certaine provinces: then he began to be affrayd for his part, and fent vnto Antonius to offer him his friendship. Then comming on with his armye neare to Rome, he made him felfe to be chosen Consul, with Anional whether the Senate would or not, when he was yet but a strippling or springal of twenty yeare ". Dold, as him felfe reporteth in his owne commentaries. So when he was Conful, he prefently appoynted Judges to accuse Brutus and his companions, for killing of the noblest person in Rome, and chiefest Magistrate, without law or judgement: and made L. Cornificius accuse Brutus, and M. Agrippa, Cassius. So, the parties accused were condemned, bicause the Iudges were Brunu accus compelled to give fuch fentence. The voyce went, that when the Herauld (according to the fed, and con-custom after sentence given) went up to the chaier or pulpit for orations, & proclaymed Bru- Official Cotus with a lowd voyce, fummoning him to appeare in person before the ludges: the people sar meanes, that stoode by sighed openly, and the noble men that were present honge downe their heads, for the death & durst not speake a word. Among them, the teares fell from Publius Silicius eyes : who short- fe. ly after, was one of the profcripts or outlawes appoynted to be flayne. After that, these three articles deuided the prouinces belonging to the Empire of Rome amonge them selues, and wirase. did fet vp billes of profcription and outlary, condemning two hundred of the noblest men of ROME to suffer death, and among that number, Cicero was one. Newes being brought thereof into MACEDON, Brutus being then inforced to it, wrote vnto Hortensius, that he should put C. For this cause therefore, Antonius afterwards taking Hortensius at the battell of PHILIPPES, he made him to be slayne vpon his brothers tombe. But then Brutus fayd, that he was more ashamed of the cause for the which Cicero was flayne, then he was otherwife fory for his death: and that he could not but greatly F reproue his friendes he had at Rome, who were flaues more through their owne fault, then through their valliantnes or manhood which vsurped the tyranny: considering that they were

whereof should onely have grieved them to the hart. Nowe when Brutus had paffed over his A army (that was very great) into Asia, he gaue order for the gathering of a great number of shippes together, as well in the coast of BITHYNIA, as also in the citie of Cyzrcvm, bicause he would have an army by sea: and him selfe in the meane time went vnto the cities, taking order for all things, and giving audience vnto Princes and noblemen of the contry that had to doe with him. Afterwards, he fent vnto Cassius in Syria, to turne him from his iorney into A-GYPT, telling him that it was not for the conquest of any kingdom for them selues, that they wandred vo and downe in that fort, but contrarily, that it was to restore their contry agains to their libertie: and that the multitude of fouldiers they gathered together, was to subdue the tyrannes that would keepe them in flauery and fubication. Wherefore regarding their chiefe purpose and intentithey should not be farre from ITALY, as heare as they could possible, but p should rather make all the haste they could to helpe their contry men. Cassius beleued him. & returned. Brutus went to meete him, and they both met at the citie of SMYRNA, which was the first time that they saw together, since they tooke leave eche of other, at the haven of PIREA in ATHEMS: the one going into Syria, and the other into Macedon. So they were maruelous joyfull, and no leffe coragious, when they faw the great armies together which they had both leavied: confidering that they departing out of ITALY, like naked and poore banished men, without armor and money, nor having any shippe ready, nor souldier about them, nor any one towne at their commaundement: yet notwithstanding, in a short time after they were now met together, hauing shippes, money and souldiers enowe, both sootemen & horsemen, to fight for the Empire of Rome. Now Caffins would have done Brutus as much honor, as Bru-C tus did vnto him: but Brutus most commonly preuented him, and went first vnto him, both bicause he was the elder man, as also for that he was sickly of bodye. And men reputed him commonly to be very skilfull in warres, but otherwife maruelous chollerick and cruell, who fought to rule men by feare, rather then with lenitie: and on the other fide he was too famillier with his friends, and would iest too brodely with them. But Brutus in contrary manner, for his vertue and valliantnes, was wellbeloued of the people and his owne, esteemed of noble men, and hated of no man, not so much as of his enemies: bicause he was a maruelous lowly and gentle person, noble minded, and would neuer be in any rage, nor caried away with pleafure and couetoufnes, but had euer an vpright mind with him, and would never yeeld to any wronge or iniuffice, the which was the chiefest cause of his fame, of his rising, and of the good n will that every man bare him: for they were all perswaded that his intent was good. For they did not certainly beleue, that if Pompey him felse had ouercome Cafar, he would have refigned his authoritie to the law: but rather they were of opinion, that he would fill keepe the fourrainty and absolute gouernment in his hands, taking onely, to please the people, the title of Conful or Dictator, or of some other more civill office. And as for Cassius, a hot, chollerick, & cruell man, that would oftentymes be caried away from inflice for gayne: it was certainly thought that he made warre, and put him felfe into fundry daungers, more to have abfolute power and authoritie, then to defend the libertie of his contry. For they that will also confider others, that were elder men then they, as Cinna, Marius, and Carbo: it is out of doubt that the ende and hope of their victorie, was to be Lordes of their contry: and in manner they did all P. confesse that they fought for the tyranny, and to be Lordes of the Empire of Rome. And in contrary manner, his enemies them felues did neuer reproue Brutus, for any fuch chaunge or defire. For, it was fayd that Antonius spake it openly diners tymes, that he thought, that of all them that had flayne Cafar, there was none but Brutus only that was moued to doe it, as thinking the acte commendable of it felfe: but that all the other conspirators did conspire his death, for some private malice or enuy, that they otherwise did beare vnto him. Hereby it appeareth, that Brutus did not trust so much to the power of his army, as he did to his owne vertue: as is to be seene by his writings. For approaching neare to the instant daunger, he wrote vnto Pomponius Atticus, that his affayres had the best happe that could be. For, saydhe, eyther I will fet my contry at libertie by battell, or by honorable death rid me of this bondage. And p furthermore, that they being certeine and affured of all thinges els, this one thing onely was doubtfull to them: whether they should line or dye with libertie. He wrote also that Antonius

BRVTVS. A had his due paiment for his folly. For where he might have bene a partner equally of the glory of Brutus, Cassus, and Cato, & haue made one with them: he liked better to choose to be iovned with Octavius Cafar alone: with whome, though now he be not ouercome by vs. yet shall he shortly after also have warre with him . And truely he proued a true Prophet, for so came Brown, a rue it in deede to paffe. Now whileft Brutus and Cafrius were together in the citie of SMYRNA: Bru-Prophet of tus prayed Cassim to let him haue some part of his money whereof he had great store, bicause all that he could rappe and rend of his fide, he had bestowed it in making so great a number of shippes, that by meanes of them they should keepe all the sea at their commaundement. Cassus friendes hindered this request, and earnestly disswaded him from it: perswading him, that it was no reason that Brutus should have the money which Cassus had gotten together by B sparing, and leanied with great euill will of the people their subjects, for him to bestowe liberally vppon his fouldiers, and by this meanes to winne their good willes, by Cassius charge. This notwithstanding, Cassius gaue him the thirde parte of his totall summe. So Cassius and Cassius werns Brutus then departing from eche other, Cassius tooke the citie of RHODES, where he too dishonestly & cruelly vsed himselse: although when he came into the citic, he aunswered some of the inhabitants, who called him Lord and king, that he was nether Lord nor king, but he onely that had flaine him, that would have bene Lord and king. Brutus departing from thence, fent vnto the Lycians, to require money, and men of warre. But there was a certaine Orator called Naucrates, that made the cities to rebell against him, insomuch that the contry men of that contry kept the straights and litle mountaines, thinking by that meanes to stoppe Brutus opaffage. Wherefore Brutus fent his horsemen against them, who stale vppon them as they were at dinner, and flue fix hundred of them: and taking all the small townes and villages, he did let all the prisoners he tooke, goe without payment of ransome, hoping by this his great curtes in the winne them, to drawe all the rest of the contry vnto him. But they were so in Iyid. fierce and obstinate, that they would mutyne for euery small hurt they receyued as they pasfed by their contry, and did despise his curtesie and good nature: vntill that at length he went to befeege the citie of the X ANT HIANS, within the which were shut vppe the cruellest and mostewarrelikest men of Lycia. There was a ryuer that ranne by the walls of the citie, in the which many men faued them selues, swymming betweene two waters, and fledde: howbeit they laved nettes ouerthwart the ryuer, and tyed litle bells on the toppe of them, to D found when any man was taken in the nettes. The XANTHIANS madea false out by night, and came to fire certaine engines of battery that bette downe their walls : but they were prefently driven in agayne by the Romanes, foloone as they were discovered. The winde by channe was maruelous bygge, and increased the slame so fore, that it violently caried it into the cranewes of the wall of the citie, fo that the next houses vnto them were straight set The citie of a fire thereby . Wherefore Brutus beeing affrayde that all the citie woulde take of a fire, he afre. presently commaunded his men to quenche the fire, and to saue the towne if it might be, But the Lycians at that instant fell into such a frensie, and straunge and horrible dispayre, that no man can well expresse it: and a man can not more rightly compare or lykenit, then to a franticke and moste desperate desire to dye. For all of them together, with their wines and children. Maisters and fermanns, and of all sortes of one what some finds of the E and children, Maisters and seruaunts, and of all sortes of age whatsoeuer, fought vppon Xambiana. the ramper of their walles, and did cast downe stones and serworkes on the Romanes, which were very buffe in quenching the flame of the fire, to faue the citie. And in contrary manner also, they brought fagotts, drye wodde, and reedes, to bringe the fire further into the citie asmuch as might bee, increasing it by suche thinges as they brought. Nowe when the fire had gotten into all the partes of the citie, and that the flame burnt bright in euery place: Brutus beeing forye to fecit, gotte vppon his horse, and rode rownde about the walles of the citie, to fee if it were possible to faue it, and helde vppe his handes to the inhabitants, praying them to pardon their citye, and to faue them felues. Howbeit they woulde not be perswaded, but did all that they coulde possible to cast them sclues aways F not onely men and women, but also litle children. For some of them weeping and cryingrout, did cast them selves into the fire: others headlong throwing them selves downed from the walles, brake their neckes: others also made their neckes bare; to the naked swordes of their fathers, and vadid their clothes, praying them to kill them their owne A handes. After the citye was burnt, they founde a woman hanged vppe by the necke, holding one of her children in her hande deade by her, hanged vppe also: and in the other hande a burning torche fetting fire on her house. Some woulde haue had Brutus to haue seene her, but he woulde not see so horrible and tragicall a sight: but when he heard it he fell a weeping, and caused a Herauld to make proclamation by sownd of trompet, that he woulde giue a certaine summe of money, to euery souldier that coulde saue a XANTHIAN. So there were not (as it is reported) aboue fiftye of them faued, and yet they were faued against their willes. Thus the XANTHIANS having ended the revolution of their fatall destinie, after a longe continuance of tyme: they did through their desperation, renue the memorie of the lamentable calamities of their Auncestors. Who in like manner, in the warres R of the Persians, did burne their citie, and destroyed them selues. Therefore Brutus likewife befeeging the citie of the PATAREIANS, perceyuing that they stowtly refisted him: he was also affrayde of that, and could not well tell whether he should give assault to it, or not. least they woulde fall into the dispayre and desperation of the XANTHIANS. Howbeit hauing taken certaine of their women prisoners, he sent them backe agayne, without payment of ransome. Nowe they that were the wives and Daughters of the noblest men of the citie. reporting vnto their parents, that they had founde Brutus a mercifull, iuste, and curteous man: they perswaded them to yeelde them selues and their citie vnto him, the which they did, So after they had thus yeelded them selues, divers other cities also sollowed them, and did the like: and founde Brutus more mercifull and curteous, then they thought they thould C. haue done, but specially farre aboue Cassius. For Cassius, about the selfe same tyme, after he had compelled the RHODIANS every man to deliver all the ready money they had in gold and filuer in their houses, the which being brought together, amounted to the summe of eyght thowsande talents: yet he condemned the citie besides, to paye the summe of fine hundred talents more. Where Brutus in contrary manner, after he had leauyed of all the contrye of Lycia but a hundred and fiftye talents onely: he departed thence into the contrye of IONIA, and did them no more hurt. Nowe Brutus in all this iorney, did many notable actes and worthy of memorie, bothe for rewarding, as also in punishing those that had deseruedit: Wherefore among the reft, I will tell you of one thinge, of the which he him felfe. and all the noble men of the ROMANBS were maruelous glad. When Pompey the great (ha- D uing lost the battell against Iulius Casar, in the fieldes of PHARSALIA) came and fell vopon the coast of ÆGYPT, hard by the citie of PBLVSIVM: those that were protectors to the young king Ptolomy, beeing then but a childe, fate in counfell with his feruaunts and friendes, what they should determine in that case. They were not all of one mynde in this consultacion: for some thought it good to receyue Pomper, others also, that they shoulde drive him out of AGYPT. But there was a certayne Rethoritian called Theodotus, that was borne in the Ile of CHIO, who was the kinges Schoolemaister to teache him Rethoricke. He beeing scholemaister called to this counsell for lacke of sufficienter men, sayde, that bothe the one and the other fide went awrye, aswell those that were of opinion to receyue Pompey, as the other that woulde haue had him driven awaye: and that the best waye was (considering the present E tyme) that they should laye holde on him, and kill him, adding withall, this sentence, that a deade man byteth not. The whole counsell stucke to this opinion. So, for a notable example of incredible misfortune, and vnlooked for vnto Pompey: Pompey the great was flayne, by the motion and counsell of this wicked Rethoritian Theodotus, as Theodotus afterwardes did him felse boalt of it. But when Iulius Cafar came afterwardes into ÆGYPT. the wicked men that confented to this counfell, had their payment according to their deferts : for they dyed enery man of them a wicked death, fauing this Theodotus, whome fortune respyted a litle while lenger, and yet in that tyme he liued a poore and miserable life, neuer tarying longe in any one place. So Brutus going vppe and downe Asia, Theodotus coulde hyde him selfe no lenger, but was brought vnto Brutus, where he suffered paines of death: F fo that he wanne more fame by his deathe, then euer he did in his life. About that tyme, Brutus fent to praye Cassius to come to the citye of Sardis, and so he did Brutus 107F A vnderstanding of his comming, went to meete him with all his friendes. There, both their as- 411 Pompon mies being armed, they called them both Emperors. Nowe, as it commonly hapneth in great death by Brit affavres between two persons, both of them having many friends, and so many Captaines yn der them : there ranne tales and complaints betwirt them. Therefore; before they fell in Hand with any other matter, they went into a litle chamber together, and bad enery man aboyde, meet at he and did thur the dores to them. Then they beganne to powre out their complaints one to the cities sadd other, and grew hot and lowde, earneftly accuting one another, and at length fell both a weeping. Their friends that were without the chamber hearing them lowd within, and angry be plaint one twene them selues, they were both amased, and affrayd also lest it would grow to further matter:but yet they were commaunded, that no man should come to them. Notwithstanding one M. Phanium R Marcus Phaonius, that had bene a friend and follower of Cato while he lived, & tooke vpon him a follower of to counterfeate a Philosopher, not with wisedom and discretion, but with a certaine bedlem Care. and frantick motion: he would needes come into the chamber, though the men offered to keepe him out. But it was no boote to let Phaonius, when a mad moode or toye tooke him in the head: for he was a hot hafty man, & fodaine in all his doings, and cared for neuer a Senator of them all. Now, though he vied this bold manner of speeche after the profession of the Craick Phile Cynick Philosophers, (as who would say, doggs) yet this boldnes did no hurt many times, bicause they did but laugh at him to see him so mad. This Phaonius at that time, in despite of the

Cassius fel a laughing at him:but Brutus thrust him out of the chamber, & called him dogge. and counterfeate Cynick. Howbeit his comming in brake their strife at that time, and so they left eche other. The felfe fame night Cassius prepared his supper in his chamber, and Brutus brought his friendes with him . So when they were fet at supper, Phaonius came to sit downe after he had washed. Brutus tolde him alowd, no man sent for him, and bad them set him at the vpper end: meaning in deede at the lower ende of the bed. Phaonius made no ceremonie, butthrust in amongest the middest of them, and made all the companye laugh at him: So they were merry all supper tyme, and full of their Philosophie. The next daye after, Brutus, vpon-D complaynt of the SARDIANS, did condemne and noted Lucius Pella for a defamed person, that had benea Prætor of the ROMANES, and whome Brutus had given charge vnto: for that he was accused and connicted of robberie, and pilferie in his office. This judgement: much misliked Cassus: bicause he him selfe had secretly (not many dayes before) warned two of his friends, attainted and conuicted of the like offences, and openly had cleered them : but yet he did not therefore leaue to employ them in any manner of service as he did before. And therefore he greatly reproued Brutus, for that he would shew him selfe so straight and severe in fuch a tyme, as was meeter to beare a litle, then to take thinges at the world. Brutus in contrary manner aunswered, that he shoulde remember the Ides of Marche, at which tyme Indian Cestar they flue Iulius Cafar: who nether pilled nor polled the contrye, but onely was a fauorer and flagne as the E suborner of all them that did robbe and spoyle, by his countenaunce and authoritie. And if Idu of March there were any occasion whereby they might honestly sette aside instice and equitie: they should have had more reason to have suffered Casars friendes, to have robbed and done what wronge and injurie they had would, then to beare with their owne men. For then fayde he. they could but haue fayde they had bene cowards: and nowe they may accuse vs of imuftice, The wonderbeside the paynes we take, and the daunger we put our selues into. And thus may we see what full confluency Brutus intent and purpole was . But as they both prepared to passe ouer againe, out of Ast a. of Brutus, in into Evrope: there went a rumor that there appeared a wonderfull figne vnto him . The which C beganne somewhat to alter Cassius minde from Epicurus opinions, and had put the souldiers allo in a maruelous feare. Thereuppon Cassius was of opinion not to trye this warre at one battell, but rather to delay tyme, and to drawe it out in length, confidering that they were the ftronger in money, and the weaker in men and armors. But Brutus in contrary manner, did alway before, and at that tyme also, desire nothing more, then to put all to the hazard of battell, on about base assone as might be possible: to the ende he might either quickely restore his contry to her 10th. former libertie, or rid him forthwith of this miferable world, being still troubled in following and mainteyning of such great armies together. Cassius was very angry with this aunswer: and Atellius was maliced and esteemed the worse for it of all men. Thereuppon it was presently determined they should fight battell the next daye. So Brutus all supper tyme looked with a cheerefull countenaunce, like a man that had good hope, and talked very wifely of Philoso-E phie, and after supper went to bed. But touching Cassius, Messala reporteth that he supped by him felfe in his tent with a fewe of his friendes, and that all supper tyme he looked very fadly, and was full of thoughts, although it was against his nature: and that after supper he tooke Castinu words him by the hande, and holding him fast (in token of kindness as his manner was) tolde him in "this Messacratic last the manner was) tolde him in "this Messacratic last the manner was) tolde him in "this Messacratic last the manner was and make the manner was tolde him in "this Messacratic last the manner was and make the manner was and make the manner was a last the manner was a last the manner was and make the manner was a last the man Greeke: Meffala, I protest vnto thee, and make thee my witnes, that I am compelled against before the zard of a battel. And yet we must be liuely, and of good corage, considering our good fortune, whome we shoulde wronge too muche to mistrust her, although we followe enill counsell. Messala writeth, that Cassius having spoken these last wordes vnto him, he bad him sarewell, and willed him to come to supper to him the next night following, bicause it was his birth day. The next morning by breake of day, the fignall of battell was fet out in Brutus and Cassius campe, which was an arming scarlet coate: and both the Chiefetaines spake together in the British and middeft of their armies. There Cassius beganne to speake first, and sayd: the gods graunt vs, O cassius talks before the parching of his waightieft causes, and after he had taken order for them, if he had any ley- A fure left him, he would read some booke till the third watche of the night, at what tyme the Captaines, pety Captaines and Colonells, did vie to come vnto him. So, being ready to goe into Evrops, one night very late (when all the campe tooke quiet rest) as he was in his tent with a littlelight, thinking of waighty matters: he thought he heard one come in to him, and casting his eye towards the doore of his tent, that he saw a wonderfull straunge and moncitie of Sardis struous shape of a body comming towards him, and sayd neuer a word. So Brutus boldly asked whathe was, a god, or a man, and what cause brought him thither. The spirit aunswered him. I am thy enill spirit, Brutus: and thou shalt see me by the citie of PHILIPPES. Brutus beeing no otherwise affrayd, replyed againe vnto it: well, then I shall see thee agayne. The spirit presently vanished away: and Brutus called his men vnto him, who tolde him that they heard R no noyle, nor fawe any thinge at all. Thereuppon Brutus returned agayne to thinke on his matters as he did before: and when the daye brake, he went vnto Cassius, to tell him what vision had appeared vnto him in the night. Cassus beeing in opinion an Epic VRIAN, and reacasina opini- forning thereon with Brutus, spake to him touching the vision thus. In our secte, Brutus, we haue an opinion, that we doe not alwayes feele, or fee, that which we suppose we doe both fee and feele: but that our fenfes beeing credulous, and therefore eafily abused (when they are idle and vnoccupied in their owne objects) are induced to imagine they see and conjedure that, which they in truth doe not. For, our minde is quicke and cunning to worke (without eyther cause or matter) any thinge in the imagination what soeuer. And therefore the imagination is refembled to clave, and the minde to the potter: who without any other C cause than his fancie and pleasure, chaungeth it into what facion and forme he will. And this doth the diversitie of our dreames shewe vnto vs. For our imagination doth vppon a fmall fancie growe from conceit to conceit, altering both in passions and formes of thinges imagined. For the minde of man is euer occupied, and that continual mouing is nothing but an imagination. But yet there is a further cause of this in you. For you being by nature giuen to melancholick discoursing, and of late continually occupied: your wittes and sences having bene overlabored, doe easilier yeelde to such imaginations. For, to say that there are spirits or angells, and if there were, that they had the shape of men, or such voyces, or any power at all to come vnto vs: it is a mockerye. And for myne owne parte, I would there were fuche, bicause that we shoulde not onely have souldiers, horses, and shippes, but also n the ayde of the goddes, to guide and further our honest and honorable attempts. With these words Cassius did somewhat comfort and quiet Brutus. When they rayled their campe. there came two Eagles that flying with a maruelous force, lighted vppon two of the forefigne by two Eagles. moste enseignes, and alwayes followed the fouldiers, which gaue them meate, and fedde them, untill they came neare to the citie of PHILIPPES: and there one daye onely before the battell, they bothe flewe awaye. Now Brutas had conquered the moste parte of all the people, and nations of that contry: but if there were any other citie or Captaine to ouercome, then they made all cleere before them, and so drewe towards the coasts of Thas sos. There Norbanus lying in campe in a certaine place called the straights, by another place called Symbolon: (which is a port of the fea) Cassius and Brutus compassed him in in such fort, E that he was driven to for fake the place which was of great strength for him, and he was also in daunger beside to haue lost all his armye. For, Octavius Casar could not followe him bicause of his ficknes, and therefore stayed behind: whereuppon they had taken his army, had not Antonius ayde bene, which made fuch wonderful speede, that Brutus could scant beleue it. So Cafar came not thether of ten daies after: & Antonius camped against Cassius, and Brutus on thother before the ci- fide against Cafar. The ROMANES called the valley betweene both campes, the PHILIPPIAN fields: and there were neuer feenetwo to great armies of the ROM ANES, one before the other, Offanine Ca- ready to fight. BRVTVS. 1074 Brutus, that this day we may winne the field, and ever after to live all the rest of our life quiet- A ly, one with another. But fith the gods have so ordeyned it, that the greatest & chiefest things amongest men are most vicertaine, and that if the battell fall out otherwise to daye then we wishe or looke for, we shall hardely meete againe: what art thou then determined to doe, to flye, or dye? Brutus aunswered him, being yet but a young man, and not ouergreatly experienced in the world: I trust, (I know not how) a certaine rule of Philosophie, by the which I did greatly blame and reproue Cate for killing of him felfe, as being no lawfull nor godly acte, touching the gods, nor concerning men, valliant, not to give place and yeld to divine providence, and not constantly and paciently to take what soeuer it pleaseth him to send vs , but to drawe backe, and flie: but being nowein the middest of the daunger, I am of a contrary mind. For if it benot the will of God, that this battell fall out fortunate for vs: I will looke no more for R hope, neither seeke to make any new supply for warre againe, but will rid me of this miserable world, and content me with my fortune. For, I gaue vp my life for my contry in the Ides of Marche, for the which I shall liue in another more glorious worlde. Cassius fella laughing to hearewhat he fayde, and imbracing him, come on then fayde he, let vs goe and charge our enemies with this mynde. For eyther we shall conquer, or we shall not neede to seare the Conquerors. After this talke, they fell to consultacion amonge their friendes for the ordering of the battell. Then Brutus prayed Cassius he might have the leading of the right winge. the which men thought was farre meeter for Casius: both bicause he was the elder man, and also for that he had the better experience. But yet Cassius gaue it him, and willed that Mes-(who had charge of one of the warrelikest legions they had) shoulde be also in that c winge with Brutus . So Brutus presently sent out his horsemen, who were excellently well ap-The banellar poynted, and his footemen also were as willing and ready eto give charge. Nowe Antonimen did cast a trenche from the marishe by the which they lave, to cutte of Cassius way to come to the sea: and Casar, at the least his armye, styrred not. As for Octavius Casar him selfe, he was not in his campe, bicause he was sicke. And for his people, they little thought the enemies would have given them battell, but onely have made some light skirmishes to hinder them that wrought in the trenche, and with their darts and slings to have kept them from sinishing of their worke: but they taking no heede to them that came full vpon them to give them battell, maruelled much at the great noyle they heard, that came from the place where they were casting their trenche. In the meane tyme Brutus that led the right winge, sent litle D billes to the Colonells and Captaines of private bandes, in the which he wrote the worde of the battell: and he him selfe riding a horse backe by all the trowpes, did speake to them, and incoraged them to sticke to it like men. So by this meanes very fewe of them vnderstoode what was the worde of the battell, and besides, the most parte of them neuer taryed to haue it tolde them, but ranne with greate furie to affayle the enemies: whereby through this diforder, the legions were maruelously scattered and dispersed one from the other. For first of all, Messalegion, and then the next vnto them, went beyond the left winge of the enemies, and did nothing, but glawnfing by them, ouerthrewe some as they went, and fo going on further, fell right vpon Cafars campe, out of the which (as him felfe writeth in his commentaries) he had bene conueyed away a little before, thorough the counsell and ad- E uise of one of his friendes called Marcus Artorius: Who dreaming in the night, had a vifion appeared vnto him, that commaunded Octavius Cafar should be carried out of his campe. Infomuch as it was thought he was flayne, bicaufe his lytter (which had nothing in it) was thrust through & through with pykes and darts. There was great slaughter in this campe. For amongest others, there were slayne two thowsand LACED EMONIANS, who were arrived but euen a little before, comming to ayde Cefar. The other also that had not glaunsed by, but had giuen a charge full vpon Cafars battell: they easily made them flie, bicause they were greatly troubled for the losse of their campe, and of them there were slayne by hand, three legions. Then being very earnest to followe the chase of them that sled, they ranne in amongest them handouer headinto their campe, & Brutus among the But that which the coquerors thought p not of occasion shewed it ynto them that were ouercome: & that was, the left wing of their enemies left naked, & vngarded of the of the right wing, who were strayed too far of, in followA ing of them that were ouerthrowen. So they gave a hot charge vpon them, But not with franding all the force they made, they coulde not breake into the middest of their battell, where they founde men that received them, and valliantlie made head against them. Howbeit they brake and ouerthrewe the left wing where Cassius was, by reason of the great disorder among them, and also bicause they had no intelligence how the right wing had sped. So they chased them beating them into their campe, the which they spoyled, none of both the Chieftaines being present there. For Antonius, as it is reported, to flie the furie of the first charge, was gotten into the next marish: and no man coulde tell what became of Octavius Casar, after he was caried out of his campe. Infomuche that there were certaine fouldiers that shewed their fwords bloodied, & fayd that they had flaine him, and did describe his face, and shewed what of anim rea B age he was of. Furthermore the voward, and the middest of Brutus battell, had alreadie put for fallely reall their enemies to flight that withstoode them, with great flaughter: fo that Brutus had con-flaine at the quered all of his fide, and Cassius had lost all on the other side. For nothing vadid them, but bassell of that Brutus went not to helpe Cassius, thinking he had ouercome them, as him selfe had done: Philippes. and Callius on the other fide taried not for Brutus, thinking he had bene ouerthrowen, as him former. felfe was. And to proue that the victorie fell on Brutus fide, Messala confirmeth it: that they wanne three Eagles, and divers other enfignes of their enemies, and their enemies wanne neuer a one of theirs. Now Brutus returning from the chase, after he had slaine and sacked Calars men: he wondred muche that he coulde not see Cassius tent standing up high as it was wont. neither the other tentes of his campe standing as they were before, bicause all the whole cape C had bene spoiled, and the tentes throwen downe, at the first comming in of the enemies. But they that were about Brutus, whose fight served them better, tolde him that they sawe a great gliftering of harnes, and a number of filuered targets, that went & came into Caffius campe. and were not (as they tooke it) the armors, nor the number of men that they had left there to gard the campe: and yet that they faw not fuch a number of dead bodies, and great ouerthrow, as there should have bene, if so many legions had bene slaine. This made Brutus at the first mistrust that which had hapned. So he appointed a number of men to keepe the campe of his enemie which he had taken, and caused his men to be sent for that yet followed the chase, and gathered them together, thinking to leade them to aide Cassius, who was in this ftate as you shall heare. First of all he was maruelous angrie, to see how Brutus men ranne to cassius offen. n geue charge vpon their enemies, and taried not for the word of the battell, nor commaunde- ded with the ment to geue charge: and it grieued him beside, that after he had ouercome them, his men rous British fell straight to spoyle, and were not carefull to compasse in the rest of the enemies behinde, and his men But with tarying too long also, more then through the valliantnesse or forelight of the Cap-committed in taines his enemies: Caffius founde him selfe compassed in with the right wing of his enemies armie. Whereuppon his horsemen brake immediatly, and fled for life towardes the sea. Furthermore, perceiuing his footemen to geue ground, he did what he could to kepe them from flying, and tooke an enfigne from one of the enfigne bearers that fled, and flucke it fast at his feete: although with much a do he could scant keepe his owne gard together. So Caffins him cassin valfelfe was at length compelled to flie, with a few about him, vnto a little hill, from whence they liammes in E might easely see what was done in all the plaine: howebeit Cassius him selfe sawe nothing, for his fight was verie bad, fauing that he faw (and yet with much a doe) how the enemies fpoiled his campe before his eyes. He fawe also a great troupe of horsemen, whom Brutus sent to aide him, and thought that they were his enemies that followed him: but yet he fent Titinnins, one of them that was with him, to goe and know what they were. Brutus horsemen sawe him comming a farre of, whom when they knewe that he was one of Cassius chiefest frendes. they showted out for ioy: and they that were familiarly acquainted with him, lighted from their horses, and went and imbraced him. The rest compassed him in rounde about a horsebacke, with fongs of victorie and great rulhing of their harnes, so that they made all the field ring againe for ioy. But this marred all, For Cassius thinking in deede that Titinnius was taken

F of the enemies, he then spake these wordes: desiring too much to line, I have lived to see one The imperof my best frendes taken, for my sake, before my face. After that, he gotte into a tent where sance of error no bodie was, and tooke Pyndarus with him, one of his freed bondmen, whom he referred in warren XXXX iiij head was found seuered from the bodie: but after that time Pindarus was neuer seene more, Wherupon, some tooke occasion to fay, that he had slaine his master without his comaundement. By & by they knew the horsemen that came towards them, & might see Titinnius crow-

The death of that had chaunced to his Captaine Calling, by mistaking; he drew out his fword, cutting him metrius, who went ynto Antonius, and caried his maisters clothes, whereof he was stripped not long before, and his fword also. This encoraged Brutus enemies, and made them so braue, D that the next morning betimes they stoode in battell ray againe before Brutus. But on Brutus fide, both his campes stoode wavering, and that in great daunger. For his owne campe being full of priloners, required a good garde to looke vnto them: and Casius campe on the other fide tooke the death of their Captaine verie heauilie, and befide, there was some vile grudge betwene them that were ouercomen, and those that did ouercome. For this cause therefore Brutus did for them in battell ray, but yet kept him felfe from geuing battell. Now for the flaues that were prisoners, which were a great number of them, & went & came to and fro amongst the armed men, not without suspicion: he commaunded they shoulde kill them. But for the freemen, he fent them freely home, and faid, that they were better prisoners with his enemies, then with him. For with them, they were flaues and servauntes: and with him, they were free E men, and citizens. So when he faw that divers Captaines and his frendes did so cruelly hate Brutus clem? fome, that they would by no meanes faue their liues: Brutus him felfe hid them, and fecretlie fent them away. Among these prisoners, there was one Volumnius a leaster, and Sacculio a common player, of whom Brutus made no accompt at all. Howbeit his frends brought them vnto him, and did accuse them, that though they were prisoners, they did not let to laugh them to fcorne, and to least broadly with them. Brutus made no aunswere to it, bicause his heade was occupied otherwayes, Whereupon, Messala Corninus sayd: that it were good to whippe them on a skaffold, and then to fende them naked, well whipped, vnto the Captaines of their enemies, to shewe them their shame, to keepe suche mates as those in their campe, to play the fooles, to make them foort. Some that stoode by laughed at his deuise. But Publius Casea, that F gaue Inlius Calar the fifft wounde when he was flaine, fayd then: It doth not become vs to be thus merie at Cassius funeralls: and for thee, Brutus, thou shalt showe what estimacion thou

Brutus aunswered againe in choller: why then doe you come to tell me of it, Cafea, and doe not your felues what you thinke good? When they hearde him fay so, they tooke his aunswere for a consent against these poore vnfortunate men, to suffer them to doe what they thought good: and therefore they caried them away, & flue them. Afterwards Brutus performed the promife he had made to the fouldiers, and gaue them the two thowfand Drachmas a peece, but yet he first reproued them, bicause they went & gaue charge vpon the enemies at the first battell, before they had the word of battell geuen them: and made them a new promife also, that if in the second battell they fought like men, he would geue them the facke and spoyle of two cities, to wit. B THESSALONICA, and LACED MMON, In all Brutus lifethere is but this only fault to be found. and that is not to be gainefaid: though Antonius and Octavius Cafar did reward their fouldiers Ensur fault farre worse for their victory. For when they had driven all the natural ITALIANS out of IT As wifely excu-LIE, they gaue their fouldiers their landes and townes, to the which they had no right: and fed by Plus moreouer, the only marke they shot at in all this warre they made, was but to ouercome, and raigne. Where in contrarie manner they had so great an opinion of Brutus vertue, that the common voyce and opinion of the world would not fuffer him, neither to ouercome, nor to faue him felfe, otherwise then justile and honestly, and speciallie after Cassius death; whome men burdened, that oftentimes he moued Brutus to great crueltie. But nowe, like as the mariners on the fea after the rudder of their shippe is broken by tempest, do seeke to naile on some

c other peece of wodde in liew thereof, and doe helpe them selues to keepe them from hurt, as much as may be voon that instant daunger: euen so Brutus, having such a great armie to gouerne, and his affaires standing verie tickle, and having no other Captaine coequall with him in dignitie and authoritie: he was forced to imploy them he had, and likewise to be ruled by them in many things, & was of mind him felfe also to graunt them any thing, that he thought might make them ferue like noble fouldiers at time of neede. For Cassius fouldiers were verie euill to be ruled, and did shewe them selves verie stubborne and lustic in the campe, bicause they had no Chieftaine that did comaund them: but yet rancke cowards to their enemies, bicause they had once ouercome them. On the other side Octavius Casar, and Antonius, were not in much better state: for first of all, they lacked vittells. And bicause they were lodged in low n places, they looked to abide a hard and sharpe winter, being camped as they were by the mathe great losse they had of their men by sea. But by The ignorates E ill fortune, rather then through the malice or negligence of the Captaines, this victory came of Braune vinot to Brutus eare, till twentie dayes after. For had he knowen of it before, he would not have mashin one bene brought to haue fought a fecond battell, confidering that he had excellent good prouifion for his armie for a long time, and belides, lay in a place of great strength, so as his campe could not be greatly hurt by the winter, nor also distressed by his enemies: and further, he had bene a quiet Lord, being a conqueror by sea, as he was also by land. This would have marueloufly encoraged him. Howbeit the state of Rome (in my opinion) being now brought to that passe, that it could no more abide to be gouerned by many Lordes, but required one only abfolute Gouernor: God, to preuent Brutus that it shoulde not come to his gouernment, kept this victorie from his knowledge, though in decde it came but a litle too late. words, but despised him so muche, that they would not vouchsafe to bring him vnto Brutus, A bicause they thought it was but a lye denised, to be the better welcome for this good newes. The (elfe tame night, it is reported that the monstruous spirit which had appeared before vnto Brutus in the citie of SARDIS, did now appeare againe vnto him in the felfe fame shape and forme, and so vanished away, and sayd neuer a word. Now Publius Volumnius, a graue & wife Philosopher, that had bene with Brutus from the beginning of this warre, he doth make mencion of this spirite, but sayth: that the greatest Eagle and ensigne was couered ouer with a fwarme of bees, and that there was one of the Captaines, whole arme fodainly fell a fweating. that it dropped ovle of roles from him, and that they oftentimes went about to drie him, but all would doe no good. And that before the battell was fought, there were two Eagles fought between both armies, and all the time they fought, there was a maruelous great filence all the B valley oner, both the armies being one before the other, marking this fight betwene them: and that in the end, the Eagle towardes Brutus gave over, and flew away. But this is certaine, and a true tale: that when the gate of the campe was open, the first man the standard bearer met that caried the Eagle, was an ATHIOPIAN, whome the fouldiers for ill lucke mangled with Brutus fecond their fwordes. Now, after that Brutus had brought his armie into the fielde, and had fet them in battell ray, directlie against the voward of his enemie: he pawsed a long time, before he gaue the fignall of battell. For Brutus riding vp and downe to view the bands and companies: it came in his head to mistrust some of them, besides, that some came to tell him so muche as he thought. Moreover, he fawe his horfemen fet forward but faintly, and did not goe lustely to gene charge: but still stayed, to see what the sootemen woulde doe. Then sodainly, one of C the chiefest Knightes he had in all his armie called Camulatius, and that was alway marueloufly effeemed of for his valliantnes, vntill that time: he came hard by Brutus a horsebacke, and roade before his face to yeeld him felfe vnto his enemies. Brutus was maruelous forie for it, wherefore partely for anger, and partely for feare of greater treason and rebellion, he sodainly caused his armie to marche, being past three of the clocke in the after noone. So in that place where he him felfe fought in perion, he had the better: and brake into the left wing of his enemies, which gaue him way, through the helpe of his horsemen that gaue charge with his footemen; when they faw the enemies in a maze, and affrayed. Howbeit the other also on the right wing, when the Captaines would have had them to have marched: they were affraid to haue bene compassed in behinde, bicause they were sewer in number then their enemies, D and therefore did fored them selues, and leave the middest of their battell, Wherby they habing weakened them felues, they could not withstande the force of their enemies, but turned taile ftraight, and fled. And those that had put them to flight, came in straight vpon it to compasse Brutus behinde, who in the middest of the conflict, did all that was possible for a skilfull Captaine and valliant fouldier: both for his wifedom, as also for his hardinesse, for the obtaining of victorie. But that which wanne him the victorie at the first battell, did now lose it him at the seconde. For at the first time, the enemies that were broken and fled, were straight cut in peeces: but at the seconde battell, of Cassius men that were put to flight, there were fewe flaine: and they that faued them felues by speede, being affrayed bicause they had bene ouercome, did discourage the rest of the armie when they came to lovne with them, & filled all the E army with feare & diforder. There was the fonne of M.Cato flaine, valliantly fighting amongst the luftie youths. For, notwithstanding that he was verie wearie, and ouerharried, yet would he not therefore flie, but manfully fighting and laying about him, telling alowde his name, and also his fathers name, at length he was beaten downe amongest many other dead bodies of his enemies, which he had flaine rounde about him. So there were flaine in the field, all the chiefest gentlemen and nobilitie that were in his armie: who valliantlie ranne into any daunger, to faue Brutus life. Amongest them there was one of Brutus frendes called Lucilius, who feeing a troupe of barbarous men making no reckoning of all men elfe they met in their way, but going all together right against Brutus, he determined to stay them with the hazard of his life, and being left behinde, told them that he was Brutus: and bicause they should beleue him, F he prayed them to bring him to Antonius, for he fayd he was affrayed of Cafar, and that he did trust Antonius better. These barbarous men being very glad of this good happe, and thinking

A them selves happie men: they caried him in the night, and sent some before vnto Antonius, to tell him of their comming. He was maruelous glad of it, and went out to meete them that brought him. Others also understanding of it, that they had brought Brutus prisoner: they came out of all parts of the campe to fee him, some pitying his hard fortune, & others faying, that it was not done like him selfe so cowardlie to be taken aliue of the barbarous people. for feare of death. When they came neere together, Antonius stayed a while, bethinking him selfe how he should vse Brutus. In the meane time Lucilius was brought to him, who stowtly with a bold countenaunce favd. Antonius. I dare affure thee, that no enemie hath taken, nor shall take Marcus Brutus aliue: and I befeech God keepe him from that fortune. For wherefocuer he be found, aliue or dead; he will be found like him felfe. And nowe for my felfe, I am come vnto

B thee, having deceived these men of armes here, bearing them downe that I was Brutus: and doe not refuse to suffer any torment thou wilt put me to. Lucilius wordes made them all amazed that heard him, Antonius on the other fide, looking vpon all them that had brought him. favd vnto them: my companions, I thinke ye are forie you have failed of your purpole. & that you thinke this man hath done you great wrong : but I doe affure you, you have taken a better bootie, then that you followed. For, in steade of an enemie, you have brought me a frend: and for my parte, if you had brought me Brutus aliue, truely I can not tell what I should haue done to him. For, I had rather have suche men my frendes, as this man here, then enemies. Then he embraced Lucilius, and at that time delivered him to one of his frendes in custodie, and Lucilius ever after ferued him faithfullie, even to his death. Nowe Brutus having paffed a

And fayth that he had forgotten the other. Within a litle while after, naming his frendes Appin meathat he had seene slaine in battell before his eyes, he fetched a greater sigh then before: spe- neih this by cially, when he came to name Labio, and Flauius, of the which the one was his Lieutenant, and the other, Captaine of the pioners of his campe. In the meane time, one of the companie

D being a thirst, and seeing Brutus a thirst also: he ranne to the river for water, and brought it in his fallet. At the felfe fame time they heard a noyfe on the other fide of the river. Whereupon Volumnius tooke Dardanus, Brutus fernaunt with him, to fee what it was : and returning straight againe, asked if there were any water left. Brutus fmiling, gentlie tolde them all was dronke, but they shall bring you some more. Thereuppon he sent him againe that went for water before, who was in great daunger of being taken by the enemies, and hardly scaped, being fore hurt. Furthermore, Brutus thought that there was no great number of men flaine in battell, and to know the trueth of it, there was one called Statilius, that promifed to goe through his enemies (for otherwise it was impossible to goe see their campe) and from thence if all were well, that he woulde lift vp a torche light in the ayer, and then returne againe with speede to E him. The torche light was lift up as he had promifed, for Statilius went thither. Nowe Brutus feeing Statilius tarie long after that, and that he came not againe, he fayd: if Statilius be aline, he will come againe. But his cuill fortune was fuche, that as he came backe, he lighted in his enemies hands, and was flaine. Thereupon he proued Dardanus, and fayd fomwhat alfo to him: at length he came to Volumnius him felfe, & speaking to him in Græke, prayed him for the studies sake which brought them acquainted together, that he woulde helpe him to put his hande to his fword, to thrust it in him to kill him. Volumnius denied his request, and so did many others: and amongest the rest, one of them sayd, there was no tarying for them there, but that they

It is reported also, that this Messala him selfe Meffala Cor- aunswered Casar one day, when he gaue him great praise before his face, that he had fought valliantlie, and with great affection for him, at the battell of Activm: (notwithstanding that he had bene his cruell enemy before at the battell of PHILIPPES for Brutus (ake) I euer loued. fayd he, to take the best and justest parte. Now, Antonius having found Brutus bodie, he caused it to be wrapped up in one of the richest cote armors he had. Afterwards also, Antonius under- C standing that this cotearmor was stollen, he put the theefe to death that had stollen it, & sent Porcia, Bru- the ashes of his bodie vnto Seruilia his mother. And for Porcia, Brutus wife: Nicolaus the Philosopher, and Valerius Maximus doe wryte, that she determining to kill her selfe (her parents and frendes carefullie looking to her to kepe her from it) tooke hotte burning coles, and cast them into her mouth, and kept her mouth so close, that she choked her selfe. There was a let-

Thus it appeareth, that Nicolaus knewe not well that time, fith the letter (at the least if it were Brutus letter) doth plainly declare the difeafe and loue of this Lady, and also the maner of her death.

THE COMPARISON OF

Dion with Brutus.

O come nowe to compare these two noble personages together, it is certaine that both of them having had great gifts in them(& specially Dion) of small occasions they made them selves great men: & therfore Dion of both deserueth chiefest praise. For, he had no cohelper to bring him vnto that greatnesse, as Brutus had of Cassius: who doubtlesse was not comparable vnto Brutus, for vertue and respect of honor, though otherwise in matters of warre, he was no lesse wise and valliant then he. For many doe impute vnto Cassius, the first beginning and originall of all the warre and enterprise: and fayd it was he that did encourage

Brutus, to conspire Casars death. Where Dion surnished him selfe with armor, shippes and

B fouldiers and wanne those frendes and companions also that did helpe him, to prosecute his

warre. Nor he did not as Brutus, who rose to greatnesse by his enterprises, and by warre got all his strength and riches. But he in contrarie maner, spent of his owne goods to make warre for the libertie of his contrie and disbursed of his owne money, that should have kept him in his banishment. Furthermore, Brutus and Cassius were compelled of necessity to make warres. bicause they coulde not have lived safelie in peace, when they were driven out of Rome: for that they were condemned to death, and pursued by their enemies. And for this cause therefore they were driven to hazard them selves in warre, more for their ownesafetie, then for the libertie of their contrie men. Whereas Dion on the other fide, liuing more merily and safelie in his banishment, then the tyranne Dionysius him selfe that had banished him: did put C him selfe to that daunger, to deliuer Sicile from bondage. Nowe the matter was not a like vnto the Romanes, to be deliuered from the gouernment of Cafar: as it was for the Syra-CVSANS, to be ridde of Dionysius tyrannie. For Dionysius denyed not, that he was not a tyranne, having filled Sicile with fuche miferie and calamitie. Howebeit Cafars power and gouernment when it came to be established, did in deede much hurt at his first entrie and beginning vnto those that did resist him: but afterwardes, vnto them that being ouercome had receiued his gouernment, it feemed he rather had the name and opinion onely of a tyranne, then otherwise that he was so in deede. For there neuer followed any tyrannicall nor cruell act, but contrarilie, it seemed that he was a mercifull Phisition, whom God had ordeyned of speciall grace to be Gouernor of the Empire of Rome, and to fet all thinges againe at quiet stay, D the which required the counfell and authoritie of an absolute Prince. And therefore the Ro-MANES were maruelous forie for Cafar after he was flaine, and afterwardes would neuer pardon them that had flaine him. On the other fide, the cause why the Syracusans did most accuse Dion, was : bicause he did let Dionysus escape out of the castell of Syracus a, and bi-DION and BRVTVS. 1082 cause he did not ouerthrow and deface the tombe of his father. Furthermore, towching the A warres: Dion alway (hewed him felfe a Captaine vnreprouable, having wifelie and skilfullie taken order for those things, which he had enterprised of his owne head and counsell: and did amende the faults others committed, and brought things to better state then he found them.

In what things Dion was inferior unio Briaus.

Where it seemeth, that Brutus did not wisely to receive the second battell: considering his rest floode voon it. For after he had loft the battell it was vnpoffible for him euer to rife againe: & therefore his hart failed him, and fo gaue vp all, and neuer durft striue with his euill fortune as Pompey did, confidering that he had present cause enough in the field to hope of his souldiers, and being beside a dreadfull Lorde all the sea ouer. Furthermore, the greatest reproache they could object against Brutus, was: that Iulius Casar having saved his life, and pardoned all the prisoners also taken in battell, as many as he had made request for, taking him for his frende, B and honoring him about all his other frends: Brutus notwithstanding had imbrued his hands in his blood, wherewith they could neuer reproue Dion. For on the contrarie fide, fo long as Dion was Dionysius frende and kinseman, he did alway helpe him to order and gouerne his affaires. But after he was banished his contrie, and that his wife was forciblie maried to an other man, and his goodes also taken from him': then he entred into iust and open warres against Dionysius the tyranne. But in this poynt, they were contrarie together. For wherein their chiefest praise consisted, to witte, in hating of tyrannes and wicked men: it is most true that Brutus defire was most fincere of both. For having no private cause of complaint or grudge against Casar, he ventred to kill him, onely to set his contrie againe at libertie. Where if Dion had not received private cause of quarrell against Dionysius: he woulde never have C made warre with him. The which Plato proueth in his Epistells, where is plainlie seene: that Dion being driven out of the tyrans Court against his will, and not putting him selfe to voluntarie banishment, he draue out Dionysius. Furthermore, the respect of the common wealth caused Brutus, that before was Pompeys enemie, to become his frende, and enemie vnto Casar, that before was his frend: only referring his frendshippe and enmitie, vnto the consideracion of iustice and equitie. And Dion did many things for Dionylius sake and benefit, all the while he trusted him: and when he beganne to mistrust him, then for anger he made warre with him. Wherefore all his frendes did not beleue, but after he had driven out Dionysus, he would stablish the government to him selfe, flattering the people with a more curteous and gentle title then the name of a tyranne. But for Brutus, his verie enemies them selues confessed, that of all D those that conspired Casars death, he only had no other ende and intent to attempt his enterprise, but to restore the Empire of Rome againe, to her former state & government. And surthermore, it was not all one thing to deale with Dionylius, as it was to have to doe with Iulius Cefar. For no man that knew Dionysus, but would have despised him, considering that he spent the most parte of his time in drinking, dycing, and in haunting lewde womens company. But to have vindertaken to destroy Iulius Casar, and not to have shroncke backe for feare of his great wifedom, power, and fortune, confidering that his name only was dreadfull vnto euerie man, and also not to suffer the kings of PARTHIA and INDIA to be in rest for him: this could not come but of a maruelous noble minde of him, that for feare neuer fainted, nor let fall any part of his corage. And therfore, to fone as Dion came into Sicilia, many thowfands of men B came and joyned with him, against Dionysius. But the fame of Iulius Cafar did set up his frends againe after his death, and was of suche force, that it raised a young stripling, Octanius Casar, (that had no meanes nor power of him felfe) to be one of the greatest men of Rome: and they vsed him as a remedie to encounter Antonius malice and power. And if men will say, that Dion draue out the tyran Dionysius with force of armes, and fundrie battells: and that in contrarie maner Brutus flue Calar, being a naked man, and without gard: then doe I aunswere againe, that it was a noble parte, and of a wife Captaine, to choose so apt a time and place, to come yppon a man of so great power, and to finde him naked without his gard. For he went not sodainlie in a rage, and alone, or with a small companie, to assaile him: but his enterprise was long time before determined of, and that with divers men, of all the which, not F a man of them once fayled him: but it is rather to be thought, that from the beginning he chose them honest men, or else that by his choyse of them, he made them good men. Whereas

A Whereas Dion, either from the beginning made no wife choyle in trulting of euill men, or elfe bicause he could not tell how to vie them he had chosen: of good mee he made them become euill, fo that neither the one nor the other coulde be the parce of a wife man. For Plate him felfe reproueth him, for that he had chosen suche men for his frendes, that he was flaine by them, and after he was flaine, no man woulde then reuenge his death. And in contrarie ma- Bretty better ner, of the enemies of Brutus, the one (who was Antonius) gaue his bodic honorable burialli red of his eand Offauius Cafar the other, referred his honors and memories of him. For att Millayee, (a bis death. citie of GAVLE on ITALIE fide) there was an image of his in braffe, verie like varo him; the

which Cafar afterwardes passing that way, behelde verie aduisedly, for that it was made by an excellent workeman, and was verie like him, and so went his way. Then he stayed sodainly a-B gaine, and called for the Gouernors of the citie, and before them, all tolde them, that the citie-

zens were his enemies, and traitors vnto him, bicause they kept an enemie of his among them. The Gouernors of the citie at the first were astonied at it, and stowtlie detived it; and none of them knowing what enemie he ment, one of them looked on an other, Octaviou Gas Bratter image far then turning him vnto Brutus statue, bending his browes, sayd vnto them: this man you ang mbraffe fee standing vp here, is he not our enemie? Then the Gouernors of the citie were worke as in Millaine, fraved then before, & could not tel what answere to make him. But Cefar laughing, and come was presented mending the GAVLES for their faithfulnes to their frendes, euen in their aduetifies; bewas offening contented Brutus image should stand still as it did. ... or hog finder og far.

Arasus wrote Abantidae the tyran flaine. Aristotle the

The citie of Sicyone, after it fell from her first government of the optimacie and nobilitie, which is proper to the cities of the Dorians: like an instrument out of tune, it fell into ciuill warres and feditious practifes, through the Orators of the people: and neuer ceassed to be plagued with those troubles and miseries, alway chaunging new tyrannes, vntill that Cleon being flaine, they chose Timoclidas and Clinias their Gouernors, two of the noblest men & of greatest authoritie in all the citie. Now when the common wealth beganne to grow to a certeine state of gouernment, Timoelidas dyed: and Abantidas, the sonne of Paseas, pretending to make him felfe Lord of the citie, he flue Clinias, and put to death some of his parentes and frendes, draue away others, and fought also to put his sonne Aratus to death, that was then but seuen yeare old. But in this hurly burly and tumult, Aratus flying out of his fathers house, among them that ranne away, and wandering vp and downe the citie, being scared and af- D frayed, finding no man to helpe him: by good fortune he gotte into a womans house, called Sofo, which was Abantidas fister, and wife vnto Periphantus, his father Clinias brother. She being of a noble minde, and judging that the childe Aratus by Gods providence fledde vnto her: hidde him in her house, and in the night secretlie sent him vnto the citie of A RG os. Now after that Aratus had scaped, and was safe from this daunger: from that time there bred in him a vehement malice against tyrannes, the which still increased in him, as he grewe in yeares. So he was vertuouslie brought vp in the citie of ARGOS, with his fathers frends: and perceiuing with him felfe that he waxed bigge and ftrong, he disposed his bodie to divers exercifes, and became so excellent in them, that he contended in fine manner of exercises, and oftentimes bare the best away. And in his images and statues, he appeared in face, ful and well E liking, as one that fed well, and the maiestie of his countenaunce argueth that he vsed suche exercise: and suche commonly are large eaters. From whence it came, that he did not geue him selfe so muche to pleading, as peraduenture was requisite for a Gouernor of a common wealth. Howebeit, some doe judge by his Commentaries he wrote, that he had an eloabooke of Co-quenter tongue then seemed vnto some: bicause he wrote them in hast, having other busines in hand, and euen as things came first into his minde. But afterwards, Dinias and Aristotle Logitian, slue Abantidas, who did commonlie vseto sit in the market place, to heare their matters, and to talke with them. And this gaue them good meanes and oportunitie to worke their feate they did. After Abantidas death, his father Pafeas possessed the tyrannie: whom Nicocles afterwardes flue also by treason, and made him selfe tyranne in his place. It is reported F that this Nicocles did liuelie resemble the countenaunce of Periander, the sonne of Cypselsus, as Orontes PERSIAN was very like vnto Alemaon, the sonne of Amphiaraus; and an other young

A LACED E MONIAN, VIITO Héttor of TROYA, whom Myrfilus wryteth, was troden under mens feete, through the ouergreat preffe of people that came to fee him, when they hearde of it. This Nicoeles was tyranne foure monethes together, in the which he did wonderfull great hurt to the citie, and had almost lost it, the ATOLIANS comming on a sodaine, who were like to haue taken it. Nowe Aratus was come to the state of a stripling, and was greatlieefteemed for the noble house he came of, and also for the great courage they founde in him, which was no small matter: and besides that, he had a maiestie in his countenaunce, being wiser then was looked for in a young man of his yeares. Therefore the banished men from the citie of Sickons, repaired vnto him before any other man. Nicocles for his parte alfo was not careleffe of his doinges, but had an eye euer to fee what Aratus intended, although

B he litle mistrusted any suche bolde enterprise, nor so daungerous an exployt of him: but did onely coniecture that he did stirre up the kings which had bene his dead fathers frendes. And fo in deede Aratus tooke that course. But when he saw that Antigonus still delayed his promises, and did alwayes tract time, and that the hope of aide from king Ptolomy of Ao YET was too farre of: at length he determined to vndertake to destroy the tyranne him selfe. So he first consulted with Aristomachus and * Ecdelus : of the which the one was banished from S1- Aratus gonth CY ONE, and the other an ARCADIAN, from the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, a Philosopher, and a about to delia valliant man of his hands, and had bene scholler to Arcesslaus the Academicke, in the citie of from the go-ATHENS. These two men being contented to joyne with Aratus, he practised with other of remnie.

the banished men also: of the which there were some that were assamed, not to be partakers C of his hope & noble attempt, and so did also ioyne with him. Howbeit the most part of them less him Ecdid not only refuse to enter into that practife, but further, went about to diffwade Aratus from his enterprise, saying: that for lacke of knowledge and experience, he vnderstoode not the driftmuchus daunger in vndertaking such a matter, alrogether so vnikelie. Nowe as desired the state of the st daunger in vndertaking such a matter, altogether so vnlikelie. Nowe, as Aratus was thinking decisine with in his minde to keepe a certaine place in the territory of Sievone, from whence they might Analus. make warre with the tyrannes: there came a prisoner vnto them out of the citie of ARGOS, that had broken prison from the tyranne of Sicyone: and was brother vnto Xenocles, one of the banished men. He being brought by the same Xenocles vnto Aratus, told that in the place whereby he had faued him felfe, the grounde within was almost as high as the toppe of the wall, the which in that parte ioyned vinto high stonie places: and that without the wall the D height was not so great, but that it was caselie scalable with ladders. When Aratus heard that, he lent two of his men, Seuthas, and Technon, with Xenocles to viewe the wall, being determined if it were true, rather to proue fecretile to execute his pretended enterprise, and quickely to put it to a venter: then to beginne a long warre, and to prepare an open armie, he being a private man, to goe against the power of a tyranne. Xenocles being returned againe to Aratus, after he had measured the height of the wall: hereported that the place was not vnscalable, but yet very hard to come to it undiscouered, bicause of certeine lite curst curres a gardiner kept hard by the wall, which would neuer leave barking. Howbeit Aratus would not leave of his enterprise so. Now it was not straunge to see euerie man prepare them selues of armor and weapon, bicause at that time there were great robberies and cruell murthers committed E by high wayes, and one would affault an other: but for the ladders, Euphranor that was a carpenter and maker of engines, did not sticke to make them openlie, bicause his common occupation did take away all suspition why they were made. For this carpenter was him selfe alfo a banished man from Sicrons, as the residue were. Furthermore, Aratus frendes he Aratus prehad in Argos, of those fewe menthey had, did euerie man of them lende him tenne men, passion deand armed thirtie of his owne men: beside them, Aratus him selfe also did hyre some prette there has a number of fouldiers, by the practife of Xenophilus, whome the Captaines of the theeues did ramie. furnish him. They were genen to understand that they should be ledde to the territorie of S1-CYONB, to take a pray of cattell and coltes of the king: and they were fent before, some one way, some another, with commaundement, all to meete together at the tower of Poly-

F gnotus, where they should tarie. So he sent Caphesias also before, without any weapons, with foure companions with him: who shoulde come to this gardiners house in the night, like straungers and trauellers; to lye in his house, and to locke him vppe and his dogges, bicause they had no other deuise to get in but that way. But in the meane time, there were A certaine spialls of Nicocles the tyranne discouered, that walked vp and downe the citic (ma-Aranu policy king no countenaunce of any matter) to see what Aratus did. Wherefore, Aratus went out of his house early in the morning (as his manner was) and walked to the market place with his frendes. Then he went to the thewe place (or place of exercises) and there stripped him felfe, annoynted him, and wreftled, and in the ende tooke certaine of the young gentlemen home with him, that were wont to make merie, and to passe the time away with him: and immediatly after, one of his feruauntes was feene in the market place, carying of garlandes of flowers. An other was feene also buying of linckes and torches, and an other hyering of these common dauncing and finging women, which followe feastes and bankets with their instruments. Nicocles spialls seeing that, were deceived: for one of them laughing on an other sayd, B that they might easely see by that, there was nothing more fearefull and timerous then a tyran: confidering that Nicocles being Lord of so great a citie, was affrayed of a young stripling, that spent all that he could rappe & rend to keepe him in his banishment, vpon vaine bankets, and feasts, at noone dayes. And thus were the tyrans spialls finely mocked. Aratus selfe departed immediatly after dinner out of Argos, & went vnto his fouldiers, whom he had appointed before to mete him at the tower of Polygnotus, & led them straight vnto Nemea. There he told them openly his full intent and purpose, having before made an Oration vnto them to encourage them, and also made them maruelous fayer promises. Then he gaue them for their watche word, Apollo fauorable, and so went directly to the citie of Sicyone, marching with great speede at the first bicause of the going downe of the Moone, and afterwardes slackened C his pace a litle, so that they had Moone light all the way as they came, and the Moone went not downe, vntill they were come to the gardiners house that was harde by the wall. So Caphelias, whome he had fent before vnto the gardiners house, came to meete with Aratus, and brought him word that he could not take the dogges, bicause they ranne away: howbeit that he had made fast the gardiner in his owne house. This discoraged the most parte of all the companie, who would needes have him in any case to returne backe againe. But Aratus then began to comfort them, and promised that he would lead them backe againe, if it chaunced that the dogges were too busie with them: and therewithall presently caused the ladder men to goe before, whom Ecdelus and Mnasitheus led, and he him selfe came faver and softly after. Aratus daun- The dogges made a fowle barking, and were baying about Ecdelus & his companie. This not- D withstanding, they came safely to the wall, and did set up their scaling ladders. But even as the first men got vp on them, the Captaine of the watch that had genen place to him that should the tyranny of ward in the morning, came by chaunce, and passed hard by them, visiting the souldiers with a litle bell, and there was a number of torches, and a great novie of menthat followed him. They that were vpon the ladders hearing them, ducked downe, and stirred not: and thereby the fouldiers that passed by them, could not see them. But now the new morning watch came towards them also, which did put them in great daunger to be discouered: but yet they once againe scaped them and were not discouered, bicause the second watch went beyond them. and stayed not. Then Ecdelus and Mnasttheus immediatly scaled the wall, & sent Technon with all possible spede vnto Aratus, to will him to make all the hast he could to come to them. Now E there was no great distance betwext the garden where the dogges were, and the wall, and a litletower where they kept a great greyhounde to keepe watche: but the greyhounde neuer heard their comming, either bicause he was a cowardly curre of nature, or els for that he had bene ouercoursed and wearied the day before. But the gardiners litle curres that bald and barked beneath, had wakened the greyhounde with their barking, who at the first began to aunfwere them with a foft girning: but when they came by the tower where he lay, he barked our alowde, that all the place thereabouts rang of his barking. Infomuch, that the skowte which was further of, called allowed to the hunt that kept the dogge, and asked what he ailed, that he made such a barking, and whether there were any thing sturring or not that angered him. The hunt within the tower aunswered, that it was nothing, but that his dogge was waked, and fell # a barking at the lights of the watch that paffed by, and at the noyfe of the bell. This made Aratus fouldiers a great deale the bolder: bicause they thought that the hunte had bene made

A primy to their enterprise, and that he went about to hide their secretattempt, and hoped also that there were many other within the citie that would further their enterprise. When they came to get vp vpon the wall, it was of a great height, and very daungerous, bicause the ladders thooke, and bowed by reason of the waight of the men, vnles they did come vp fayer and loftly one after another. Furthermore the time did put them in some perill, bicanse the cocks began to crowe, and the contry folke that brought things to the market to fell, began to come a pace to the towne out of enery quarter. And therefore Aratus made hafte to get vp having onely forty men aboue with him, and looked for some besides to come vp, which were yet beneath. Then he marched directly towards the tyrannes pallace, where his hiered fouldiers the cities of the cities kept watch and ward: and comming fodenly vpon them, layed hold of euery man of them, & Siegene with

B flue not one. Then he fent into the citie to his friends, to will them to come vnto him. Therevppon they ranne out of enery corner to Aratus. Now the day began to breake, and straight the Theater was full of people that gathered together, bicause of the novse and sturre they heard in the citie, not knowing what the matter ment : vntill at length an Herauld proclay med with open voyce, that it was Aratus the sonne of Clinias, who called his contry men and Citizens to the recourrye of their libertie. Then they perswading them selves, that the thing which they long wished and looked for, was nowe come to passe: they ranne all in a trowpe together to the tyrannes house, and set it a fire. But the flame rose so high and great after the fire had taken it in enery part, that it was seene to the citie of CORINTHE: infomuch that the CORINTHIANS wondring what the matter should be, were in mind to have gone to helpe it. C Now for Nicocles, he faued him selfe, and got out of the citie by secret vaults he had made vit- Nicolashe

The which Aratus hyndered not, but did moreouer make all the rest of the tyrants goods common amongest them. So his enterprise had so good successe, that there was none of his owne company slavne he brought with him. nether any of their enemies that were within the citie, fortune kept this exployr fo pure and cleane from any bloudshed. Then Aratus restored soure score men vnto their lands & goods againe, whome the tyrant Nicocles had banished: and others also, that had benebanished by former tyrants, to the number of fine hundred men, who had bene well neare fifty yeares space banished out of their contry. Nowethe most of them being comen home poore and needy, D would have entred on their goods and lands they enjoyed before; and for entring agains upon their lands in their contry, and their houses in the citie, they amazed Aratis withall, seeing Antigonus on the one fide practife all the meanes he could to winne Sic rong beeing nowe free and they all in an vprore and mutinie in the citie. This notwithstanding, they made their enemies know that the power of GRECE when it was vnited and gouerned by good policie was of great force, and almost inuincible. For the A CHAIANS being in comparison of the auncient force of Griece, of the fee gard, and but a part of one citic enfeebled with citill and forrein warre! So long as they could fubmit them selves to be ruled by the wisedom and vertue of their Captaine, and not entire malice his prosperitie and souerainty; they did not onely mainteyne them selues as free inenin the middest of the serviced of so many great cities, large and mighty, but did also deliver many other people of GRECE from their tyrants. Now, for Aratas manners the Wastone Hat Arana referin nature loued civill government, and equalitie among Citizens in one felfe citie: he was red all things I nobly minded, and more paintfull about the affayres of the common weale, then carefull of mon weale. his owne busines, and hated tyrants to the death, and imployed his good or enill will whole for the service of the common wealth. And therefore he seemed not to be so sownd a friend, for the common wealth. To be thort, it was a generall and common voyce amonge all the cities confederats, in private company, and at open meetings in the Theaters: that Aratus loued nothing but vertue, and honesty. That in open warres he was not so valliant and coragi-ous as he was crafty and futtell, to take a citie on the fodaine. Furthermore, though he was valliant to attempt many great things, the which men thought he would neuer haue brought to passe; yet it seemeth he left many thinges possible vndone, the which he might easily haue VVir orles done for that he durst not venter on them. For as there be beastes whose sight is perfittest by by day.

night, and nor night, and by day they can see nothing, bicause the subtilitie of the humor and movsture in their eyes is dried vp, and cannot abide the bright light of the daye: euen fo, men that otherof Philisophy wife by nature are very wife, are eafely affrayd of daunger, when they must venter on it at B be liked on- noone dayes, where contrarily they are bold in fecret enterprises, sodeinly to attept any thing. Now, this contrarietie and difference in men well brought vp, groweth through ignorance & lacke of instruction of Philosophie, which of it selfe doth norish vertue, as frute that springeth vp without planting or helpe of mans hand. But this is best discerned by examples. So Aratus hauing joyned him felfe and his citie Sicyone vnto the Achaians, and feruing in person as a man of armes among the rest: he was maruelously beloued of his generalls, that saw him so obedient. For not with standing that he had made so large a contribucion as the estimation of him selfe, and the force of his citie vnto the common wealth of the ACHAIANS: yet he was as ready to obey and execute the commaundements of the generals, as the poorest and meanest fouldier, were he of DYMA, or of TRITA, or of any other small village whatsoeuer. Further- C more, a great fumme of money beeing fent him from king Ptolomy for a gifte, amounting to twenty and five talents, he tooke it, but forthwith disposed it amongest his poore contry men, both to releeue their want, as also to redeeme prisoners. This notwithstanding, the banished men still vexed & troubled them that had their goods & lands, to haue the out of their hands, and otherwise would be satisfied by no meanes. Their common wealth therefore beeing in great daunger to fall into civill warre, Aratus perceiving there was no other way to helpe this mischiefe, but by Ptolomies liberalitie: he determined to goe vnto him, to praye him to helpe him with money to pacific this grudge and tumult. So he imbarked at the hauen of Metho-NA, about the foreland of MALEA, to fayle from thence into ÆGYPT: howbeit he had fuch a contrary wind, and the lear of e so hie, that the maister of the shippe was driven to let her goe D whether the woulde to take fear oome. So beeing driven quite from his direct course, with great daunger he got to the citie of A DRIA, which was his enemy: bicause Antigonus kept it, and had a garrifon in it. But Aratus did wifely preuent it, going a shore, & wandred farre from the sea, with one of his friends called Timanthes, and got into a wodde, where they had an euill nights rest. He had not gone farre after he had lest his shippe, but the Captaine of the garrison came, and sought for him. Notwithstanding, his servaunts had mocked him finely, being before instructed by Aratus what aunswer they should make) saying that he was gone, and fled into the Ile of Ev BOE A. Howbeit, the Captaine of the garrison stayed the shippe, his men, and all things els the had in her, and tooke her for a good prife. Within fewe dayes after, Aratusbeing maruelously troubled, and at a straight with him selfe what he should doe: there E happily arrived a Romane shippe hard by the place where he kept most, partly to hide him felfe, and partly also to see if he could discouer any thing. This shippe was bownd for Syria. So he had delt with the mafter of the flippe in that force, that he tooke him abourd, and promised he would deliuer him in CARIA, and so he did . But he was in as much daunger, this second iomey againe by sea, as he was in the first he made towards AGYPT. From CARIA, long time after, Aratus went into Agypt, and spake with the king, who made very much of him: for Aratus feed him still by sending of him passing fayer tables, and pictures of GRECE, of excellent workemanship. And in deede haning a singuler good wit, he alwayes got together, and bought the excellentest painted pictures he could get, but specially the pictures of Pamphilus and Melanthus, to fend them vnto the king. For learning florished yet in the citie of SI- F CYONE, and they effeemed the paintings of tables in that citie, to be the perfitteft for true cullers, and fine drawing, of all other places. Infomuch as Apelles, (though he was then of marueA lous fame for paynting) went thither, and gaue to these two excellent paynters a talent, to re-passe all the amayne a while in their company: not so much to attaine to the perfection of the art, as there- in Grece, by to winne him selfe fame. And therefore when Aratus had restored his citic againe to libertie, he caused all the images of the tyrannes to be defaced and plucked downe: howbeit he The excellen stoode doubtful a long tyme, whether he should deface Aristratus picture or not, who raigned the oither in the tyme of Phillip. For it was paynted with the hands of all the schollers of Melanthus, be-the tyran of ing by a triumphant chariot, that caried a victorie, and as Polemon the Geographer writeth, Sicyone, pain-Apelles hand was to it. This picture was a paffing peece of worke to fee to, so that Aratus at the Loubus febolfirst yelded, and was contented to saue it for the excellencye of the workemanship: yet in the lers and A. ende, ouercome with the extreme hate he bare vnto tyrants, he bad it should be defaced. Now pelles help: 69 B it is reported also, that Nealces the paynter being one of Aratus friends, prayed him with the fullation for teares in his eyes to pardon such a notable peece of worke. But when he sawe Aratus so hard the defains. harted that he would not graunt it: he tolde him it was good reason to make warre with ty- of it.

The loging of rants, but not with their pictures. Let vs then (4 he) leaue the chariot of triumphe and victo- Nealess the rie, and I will make thee fee Aristratus, willingly to come out of the table. Aratus was conten- paymer, onted to let him haue his will. Then Nealces defaced the picture of Aristratus, and in place there-

vnder the chariot were conucied Aristratus feete defaced, So Aratus by meanes of these tables and pictures, was marueloufly well beloued of king Prolomy. But after that he was acquaynted with him, and knew his conversation: he loued him then better then before. Insomuch that The great C he gaue him a hundred and fifty talents to helpe his citie withall: of the which he caried for- berafitie of ty away with him vnto Peloponnesvs, and the king afterwards fent him the rest at fundry Prolomy unto tymes. Nowe this was a maruelous matter of him to get fuch a maffe of money together for his Citizens: confidering that the Orators, Captaines and Gouernors of free cities, for a litle fumme of money onely which they have taken of kings and Princes, have bene corrupted & betrayed their townes and contry. But this was a more wonder, that by meanes of this money, he made peace and loue betwixt the poore and riche, and furthermore, faued vpright all the people of Sicyone, where he shewed him selfe maruelous wise, and temperate, being of that Arabu trusgreat power and authoritie he was. For after they had chosen him Arbitrator to judge, compownd, and absolutely to decyde all quarrells and strife betwene the banished men: he would neuer vndertake it him felfe alone, but tooke fifteene other of the chiefest Citizens with him. and with them, with great paynes and trouble, at length he pacified all matters among his citizens, and made them good friends one with another. Therefore, not onely all the inhabitants and Citizens of Sicyone together, did not onely decree publike honors meete for him: but also the banished men them selves did privately cast his image in brasse, and set it vp. vnder the which they caused this inscription to be grauen.

Thy prouvesse and thy feates of armes, thy counsell sage and uvise, Not onely are among the Greekes extolled to the skyes, But also to the vitmost streyts of Marrok blouven by fame. And we that through thy goodnes home into our contry came, Have set this image up to thee Aratus, as a signe Of our deliurance through thy loue and through the power dinine. For thy good nature furthred by good fortune doth restore Vs contry, lauves, and libertie, bereft vs quite before.

Aratus having done all these thinges, he suppressed the enuye of the Citizens, through the great good turnes he had done vnto them. But then king Antigonus being angry with Aratus in his mind, and feeking either to make him his friend, or to bring him to be mistrusted of Ptolomy: he did him many other great curtefies, Aratus neuer feeking them at his hands. But one day specially about the rest, as he did facrifice vnto the gods at Corinth, he sent Aratus part of his weathers he had facrificed, vnto Sicyone. And at the feast of his facrifice in the hea-F ring of many noble men that were bidden ghests, he sayd openly of Aratus: I did alway thinke that this young Sicyonian could not but have a liberall mind, louing the libertie of his contry and contry men: but I perceive now he is a man that can judge of Princes manners and

great fleete of thippes, and of fuch a fumptuous Court, as king Ptolomyes Court. But now that he knoweth by experience, that it is onely but a fmoke and vaine pompe, he is come to vs: & for my part, he is welcome to me, & I will have you all to take him for my friend. These words of king Antigonus, were straight taken at bownd of certaine enuious men, and caried for lacke of better matter vnto king Ptolomy, euery man striuing who should write all the euil they could against him: So that Ptolomy thereuppon sent a Messenger of purpose vnto him, to reproue him for it. Thus fell there out much enuy and malice, between the earnest loue of these Prin-Araku doings ces and kings, that contended with eche other who should have Aratus, Furthermore, the first tyme that Aratus was chosen Lieuetenant generallof the trybe of the A CHAIANS, he forraged B and spoyled the contry of LOCRIDE, which lyeth directly ouer against ACHAIA, and CALY-DONIA alfo. Howbeit he came not tyme enough to ayde the BOBOTIANS, in the battell which they lost before the citie of CHERONEA, against the ÆTOLIANS: where Abaccritus, Gouernor of BOROTIA was flayne in the field, with a thowfand other BOROTIANS, Howbeit the next yeare following, he being the fecond time chosen Lieuetenant generall, he attempted to win the castell of Corinthagaine, being an enterprise which not onely concerned the private benefit of Sicyone it felfe, and the trybe of the Achaians, but also of all GRECE besides. For, he was fully bent to drive the garrison of the MACEDONIANS thence, the which seemed euen a very yoke that held all the GRECIANS nofes to the gryndstone. For like as Chares, Captaine of the ATHENIANS, having in a certaine conflict discomfitted the kings Lieuetenants, C wrote to the ATHENIANS that he had wonne a victory halfe fifter to the victory of Marathon: Euen so me thinkes it were no diffrace to fay, that this execution was like (as one brother to another) to the killing of the tyrants, which was done by Pelopidas THEBAN, and Thrasybulus ATHENIAN, fauing that this last acte was more famous, bicanse it was not against GRECI-ANS, but against straungers, and forreyn power and gouernment, you whom it was executed. For the Ishmus or barre of PELOPONNESVS, which seperateth the sea Ægeum from the sea lonium, doth come and joyne the firine land of the rest of GRECE, with the PRESCHE, an Iland of Peloponnesvs. Euen so likewise, the Mountaine called Acrocorinthe, on the which the castell standeth, rising up in the middest of GRECE, when there is any garrison of men of warre in it, it cutteth of all traffike and paffage by, of any armies of them which inhabite with- D in the straite: from them that are without the straight, both by sea and by land, and maketh him onely Lorde of the contry that keepeth the castell. So that it was not for sport, but for truth, and in good earnest, that Philip the young king of MACED ON was wont to call the citie and castell of CORINTH, the stockes and gyues of GRECE. And therefore was this castel maruelously wished and defired of euery man, but specially of kings and Princes. But the defire Antigonus had of it was so vehement, that it differed nothing from the passions of a frantick louer. For he did nothing els continually but study and deuise howe he might winne it vppon the fodeine, from them that kept it: bicause otherwise by open force, it was impossible to be had. Wherefore after the death of Alexander that kept that castell, being poyloned (as it is reported) by Antigonus practife, the castell being left in the handes of his wife Nicea, who go- E uerned the state of CORINTHE, and did carefully cause the Acrocorinthe to be kept: he immediatly fent his sonne Demetrius thither, and put Nicas in good hope to mary her with this young Prince: a thing that pleased this Lady well, though she was very olde. So, for her selfe, the was wonne straight, by meanes of his young sonne Demetrius, whome he vsed as a stale to. intrappeher. Howbeit Nicaa for all this goodly offer, forfooke not her castell, but alwayes made it straightly to be looked vnto. Autigonus seemed to make no accompt of it, but dayly gaue him felle to make fumptuous facrifices, feafts, and playes to the gods, within the citie of CORINTHE for the mariage: as though he had ment no other thing, but bancketing and iolitie all that might be. When the hower was come to fee these sportes, and that the Musition Amabeus began to finge: he him selfe made as though he would accompany Nicea vnto the F Theater, being conveyed thither in a sumptuous riche lytter, as it had bene for a Queene. She was very glad of this honor, and thought nothing leffe then of that which happened her . But when Antigonus came to the ende of a streete that turned to goe up the hill towards the castell he bad her keepe on still to the Theater: and him selfe in the meane time left Amabeus there with his finging, and all the feast of the mariage, and went straight vp to the castell, forcing him selfe about his strength and yeares. When he was at the toppe of the hill, and found the gates shut, he knocked with his staffe, and commaunded the garrison to open him the gates. They wondring to fee him there in person, did let him in. When he was gotten into the castell, he was so exceeding joyfull of it, that he had no reason to moderate his joye, but would bancket in the middeft of ftreetes, and in the market place, having minftrells to playe kets the revoon their instruments at his table, wearing garlands of flowers on their heads for iove, and fell of the Man did fo fondly and lightly behave him felfe, as if he had bene a light young man, and not (as he recommbe.

R was anolde man; who had proued fuch fundry chaunges of fortune, and yet suffered him felfe to be thus caried away with pleasure, that he imbraced, and spake to enery man he met. Wherby it is easte to judge, that toy possessing a man without wit or discretion; it maketh him Ourgress besides him selfe, and doth more trouble his wirs, then payne or feare. Now Antigomes halling in to a simple wonne the castell of the Acrocorinthe, as you have heard, he put it into the Hands of the length man, maketh multed best, to befafely kept: and therefore made Perfaus the Philosophiel Cabraine of Buthin mad castell But in deede Aratus was in mind to have attempted the taking of the antill fin Mexagit philosopher, ders life tyme : yet he let it alone, bicaufe he ioyned him felfe with the Achar Ass. But It that made captains tyme there was offered him another occasion againe to attempt it, and this if was Att Columbia. KINT He, there were foure brethren borne in STRIA, of the which, one of them Heing called trans deter-C Diotles, was a fouldier of the garrison of the castell: and the reft, having robbed the kings treat mination for fure.went straight vnto Sicvons, to AEgias the banker, whome Aratio imploved in his far the drocecultic. These three brethren immediatly fold him part of the gold they had robbed and after sinthe. wards, one of them called Erginus, comming often to fee him, by little and little fold him all the seft. By this meanes AEgias fell into famillier acquaintance with him, and taked with him of the garrison of the castell of the Acrocorinthe. Erginus told him, that going vinto his brother vp those steepe and higherockes, he found a path as it were cut out of the rocke, that went to a place of the wall of the castell, which was very lowe. AEgias hearing that, auniwered biling

when in one howers space you can sell such a great masse of money together? for aswell fills D you dye if you be apprehended for this felony, as if you were otherwise attained for treason. Erginus with that fell'a laughing, and promifed that he would feele his brother Diocles minde in it, for he did not greatly trult his other brethren . So returning shortly after, he bargayied with Aratus to bring him to a place of the wall that was not about fifteene foote highe, promiling that he would helpe him to execute the rest, with his brother Diocles Aratus promised? then to give him fifty talents, if he brought his enterprise to passe: and if he fayled, that he would then give either of them a house and a talent. Erginus would have the whole 50, talents' put into AEgias the bankers handes. Aratus had not so much ready money, and besides, he would not take it vp at very for feare of giuing cause to suspect his enterprise. Wherefore he tooke all his place of gold and filuer, and his wives iewells, and layed them to gage to Aleias, E to disburse the sayd summe. But Aratus had so great and noble a mind in him, and was so bent to doe notable acts: that knowing howe Photion and Epaminondas had bene effeemed for the instell and honestell men of GRECE, bicause they had refused great giftes that were offered them, and would neuer fell nor stayne their honor for money . he yet fur passing them; was contented to fpend his owne, to bring any good enterprise to passe, & did put his life in dainger for the common benefit of his contry menthey them felices knowing nothing of his enterprife, which turned all to their benefit. What is hethen, that will not wonder at the great magnanimitie and corage of fuch a man, and that will not even nowe as it were, be willing to ayde him: confidering how dearely he bought fo great a danneer of his person, and howe he lated his plate and all the riches he had to gage, to be broughern the night among the middelt

F of his enemies, where he was to fight for his owne life, hauling no other gage nor pledge; but the hope of such a noble enterprise, and nothing els? Burnow, though the enterprise of it self was daungerous, an error chauncing through ignorance are the first; made it yet more daungerous. For Aratus had fent Technon, one of his men before with Diocles, to viewe the wall. A This Technon had neuer spoken with Diocles, howbeit he thought in his minde what manner of man he was, by the markes that Erginus had given him of him: that he had a blacke curled heare, that his face was blacke, and that he had no beard. Nowe Technon being come to the place where Erginus fayd he would be with Diocles: he stayed before the towne in a place called Oan 15. So whilest he was tarying there, the elder brother of Diocles, called Dionysius (who knew nothing of the enterprise, nor was made acquaynted withall, and looked very like his brother Diocles) came that way by chaunce. Technon being moued by the markes he fawe in him like vnto those he was told of: asked him if he were nothing a kinne to Erginus. The ather aunswered, he was his brother. Then Technon perswading him selfe it was certenly Dioeles that spake to him, without asking him his name, or making other inquiery of hims he B tooke him by the hand, and began to talke with him of the practife he had with Erginge, and to aske him of it. Dienyfine taking the matter vpon him, & feeding on his error, returned forthwith into the citie, holding him on still with talke, Technon mistrusting nothing. But euch as Dionylus was ready to take him fast by the choller; his brother Erginus came. Who perceyuing how Technon had miltaken the matter, and the daunger he was in beckned to him with his head to flye and so they both ranne for life vaso Aratus, to faue them schies. Howbeit Arathe was nothing the more discoraged for this, but sent Erginus straight to cary his brother Dionyline money, and to praye him not to be aknowen of anything: who furthermore brought him with him unto drafus. But after they had him once, they made him fuer for starting : for they bound him, and locked him up fast in a chamber, whilest they went about their enterprile. So when allthings were ready, Aretus commaunded the rest of his army that they should tary behind, armedall night; and he him felfe, with foure hundred of the best men he had, (not knowing them felies whether they went, nor to what intent) went straight to the gates of the citie passing by the temple of Iuno. This was about the middest of summer, when the Moone was at the full, and the element very cleere without clowdes: infomuch that they were affraid their armors, would glifter by Moone light, and bewray them. But as the formost of them came neare vnto the citie, there role clowdes out of the fea that darkened all the citie & places thereabouts, and shadowed them. Then all of them sitting downe on the ground, plucked of their thoes, both bicaute they should make lesse noyse, as also for that their footing should besverer, and that they should slippe lesse vpon the ladders. But Eiginus, and seven other com- D panions with him like men that travell, came fecretly into the gate of the citie, and flue the porter and warders there. At that very instant, Aratus caused the ladders to be set up against the walls, and made a hundred of his fouldiers get vp on them: and fent also to commaund the rest, that they should follow him with all possible speede. Then drawing up his ladders after him, as fast as he could he went through the citie with his hundred men roward the castely with fuch a joyfull cheere, as if he had had it already in his hand, for that he faw he was not discouered. But as he went on, he saw source of the watch comming with a light against them. They faw not Aratus and his company, but the enemies faw them plainely a farre of, Aratus &c his men therefore stoode up close against old walls to tary their comming, and at the first onfer flue three of them: but the fourth having a blowe on his head with a worde, ranne away, E. making an outcry, that the enemies were in the citie. The trompets forthwith fownded the alarom, all the citie was in an yprore, the streetes were straight full of people ronning yp and downe, and of lights in euery corner, both beneath in the citie, as also in the castell, and the noylewas great enery where, Aratus in the meane tyme forced to get up the hie rocks fayer & fostely at the first, and with great payne and difficultie, being out of his pathe he should have found, which he miffed, being very deepe into the rocks, and with many crookes and crankes. went to the foote of the castell : but sodainely even as it had bene by miracle, the Mooneappearing through the clowdes, when they were in their worst way, it gaue the light, & brought them to that part of the wall where they (hould be, and straight the Moone was shadowed againe. Now the three hundred fouldiers whome Aratus had left at the gate by the temple of P. Tuno, when they were come into the cirie, being full of lights, and in vprore, and befides could not find the path by the which their Captaine Aratm went before them: they stoode close toA gether under a rockethat shadowed them, forowfully looking to heare some newes of Arabin who was then fighting with the garrison of the castell, the which made head againshim with all the force and power they could . Vnder the castell there was a great noyse theard of men that fought, but yet the noyle was so confused by the sound rebounding against the rocks and mountaine, that they could not deuile whence it thould come. So they being in this perplexitie, not knowing which way to turne them selues: Archelaus, Captaine of king Antigonus men, hauing a good number of fouldiers with him, went up the hill with great cryes and noyfe of trumpets, to fet vpon Aratus, and his company behind. But after he was passed by these three hundred fouldiers of Aratus band, they gaue charge vpon him, as if they hadbene layed there in ambushe of purpose, and slue the first they encountered withall, and made the others

B fo affrayde, and Archelaus him felfe, that they dispersed them, and made some flye one way, fome another wave. So, as they were ouerthrowen, Erginus, came to these three handred men, comming immediatly from them that fought, and brought them newes that Aratus and them of the castell, were come to the sworde together, and valliantly defended them selues, lustely fighting for the wall, and therefore it was tyme for them to helpe tim quickly . Then the fouldiers bad him bringe them thit her straight , and so he did . So they clyming up the hill, did signifie by their cryes to their men, that they came to ayde him Furthermore, the Moone beeing then at the full, and thining on their harnes, made their enemies in the castell thinke that they were a greater number then in deede they were, bicause of the longe wave they had to make to gette vppe vpon the rockes: and also bicause of the found in

C the night, that made their crye feeme to be of a greater number then they were. At length the draw they have fought to we for lightly that they have been fought to the draw. they joyning with Aratus, they fought it out fo luftely, that they draine the garrifonous of rinhs. the walls, and by breake of daye wanne the castell. So that their exployt was discouered by the rifing of the Sunne, and besides, all the rest of their armye that came from the citie of SICYONE: whomethe Corinthians very gladly receyted, and did fet open their gates vnto them, and ayded them to take king Antigonius men . Afterwards, when they thought that all was fafe, then Aratus came from the castell vnto the Theater of the citie, whether repayred an infinite number of people, aswell for the desire they had to feehim, asalfort heare him speake vnto the Corinthians. So having placed the Acharans of either fide jat the comming into the Theater: Aratus being armed, went up into the chayer or publication

D orations, having his face quite chaunged, both for the great paynes he had taken, and also for lacke of fleepe: fo that his body being ouerwearied, his spirits were even done. Now when all the affembly of the people (seeing him in the chayer) did humble them selues to showe him all the honor and kindnes they could possible: he tooke his speare out of his left hand into his right, and bowing his knee and body formewhat, he leaned upon it, and fo ftoode a great while in this manner before he spake, receiving the cryes of ioy and clapping of handes which the people made, prayfing his valliantnes, and bleffing his good happe and fortune. Then when they had done, and were quiet againe, he framed his countenance, and began to make an oration vnto them in the name of all the tribe and common wealth of the ACHAIANS, meete for the enterprise from whence he came: and perswaded them to loyne to the ACHAIANS, So. E therewithall, they presently deliuered him the keyes of their citie, the which were neuer be-

Now, the Ro- A MANE'S wondring at the valliantnes of Philopemen: they called him the last of the GRECIANS. we say famous man of Euen so might I also (in my opinion) say, that this acte is the last and most famous of all the the Gracians. GRECIANS, and descrueth to be equal, as well for valliantnes, as also good successe, with the greatest exployees of the most famous auncients: as that which followed immediatly after doth amply declare. For the MEGARIANS revolting from king Antigonus, did straight ioyne with Aratus: and the TROEZENIANS also with the EPIDAVRIANS, did likewise enter into league and friendship with the ACHAIANS, So at the first inuation he made, he went to spoyle the contry of ATTI CA, and croffed ouer to the Ile of SALAMINA, and spoyled and destroyed it euen as if he had deliuered the power and force of the ACHAIANS out of prison to serue his owne turne in any thing he thought good of. Howbeit, he fent home the ATHENIAN prifo- p ners without paying of ranfom; and all of policie to make them defirous to rebell against the

MACEDONIANS, Furthermore, he made king Ptolomy a friend and confederat of the ACHAI-ANS, with condition, that he should be Lieuetenant generall both by sea & by lande. For these respects Aratus was of maruelous estimation and credit with the Achaians: insomuch that where they could not yearely choose him their general, being contrary to their law; they chose him at the least every second yeare, but in effect, all was done by his aduise and counsell. For they faw plainly, that it was nether honor, nor riches, nor friendship of kings & Princes, nor the private benefit of his owne citie wherein he was borne, nor any other thing elsthat he preferred before the glory & increase of the common wealth of the ACHAIANS. For he was of opinion, that cities by the felues were but weake, & being joyned together with the chaine of common benefit, they were a strength one to preserve the other. And in like manner, even as the parts that are in the bodies of brute beafts haue life & fustenance, being joyned & knit together, & straight so soone as there is any seperation of them thone from thother, they live no more & putrifie: euen so cities also were brought to decay by them that did disperse their focietie among them, & in contrary manner did then againe increase, when ioyning with any other great body & city, they were gouerned with wifedom & good counfell. So Aratus feing the chiefest cities thereabouts enjoy their lawes and liberties: thought it a shamefull thing to leave the ARGIVES in flauery & bondage, Wherefore he practifed to kil the tyrant Aristomathat gouerned them, both to thew him felfe thankefull to the citie for his bringing vppe there as also to joyne that great & mighty citie vnto the tribe of the A CHAIANS. Now there D were divers men that had the harts and corage to vindertake to doe it, of the which the chie-felt were AEschylus, and Charimenes the Soothsayer, but they had no swordes: for they were straightly forbidden by the tyrant, and grieuous punishments ordevned for them that should red little fbor daggers abe found with any fwordes. Aratus therefore caused certen litle short daggers to be made at CORENTHE for them, the which he fowed up in packes carried on certen beafts loden with other baggage and stuffe. But the Soothfayer Charimenes, did impart this enterprise vnto a third man, and made him one of the conspiracie with them . AE(chylus being very much offended with it, beganne therefore to enter into practife by him felfe, and left their company. Chariménes perceiuing that, tooke fuch a toye in his head in a mad moode, that he bewrayed them as they went about to execute their enterprise. This notwithstanding, the most parte of the R

shortly after, by his owne men. But then another tyrant, Aristippus, a crueller man than the first, zam of the ci- made hafte to take the tyranny before he could be relifted. This not with standing Aratus, with all the young men of the ACHAIANS able to ferue in the field, went fodainly thither with ayde, hoping to find them of the citie very glad to recouer their libertie. Howbeit the people being acquainted, and of long time vied paciently to beare the yoke of bondage: there was not a man of them that would once take his part. So he returned backe againe, and did nothing, fauing that thereby the Achaians were accused, bicause that in open peace they had made warre, & therfore they were put in fute before the Mantinians, at Arilippus request, tyrant of Ar-GOS. The matter was pleaded in Aratus ablence, & the ACHAIANS were condened to pay the F fumme of 30. Minas. After this proofe & attept of Aratus, Ariftippus being affraid of Aratus, & hating him to the death, fought waies to kil him, with the help of Antigonus, who did aide him

A in it: and almost there were spialls in every corner, that did nothing els but lye in wayte to execute Aristippus minde. Now, there is no suerer garde vnto a Prince, then the perfit loue 26 funn and good will of his subjects. For, after that the nobilitie and common people have benevfed to feare, not him, but those that for him commaund them : he then feeth with many eyes, we lose of his heareth with many eares, and knoweth what is done farre of . Here therefore I will a little digresse from my historie, to showe you the manner of Aristippus life the tyrant, whereunto he was brought by this so much defired tyrannical government, and smoke of signiorie, so estecmed of all men. Now, though Aristippus had king Antigonus his friend, and that he kept a great gard of fouldiers about him for the lafety of his person, and that there was not an enemy of rifinguished his left aliue in all the citie: yet he made his fouldiers watche and lye without his pallace, vn. man of me B der the cloifters and galleries thereabouts, & after supper turned all his men out of the dores, & then shut his Court gates to him, and locked him selfe alone with his Concubine, in a little hie chamber with a trappe dore, and fet his bed vpon it, & fo flept, as one that continually was affraid of him felfe. Then after he was come vp, his Concubines mother came to take vp the ladder, and locked it in an other chamber: and so did let it downe agains the next morning. and called this trymme tyrant, that went downe out of his chamber, like a snake that should haue crept out of her hole. Where Aratus in contrary manner, not having obtained by force of armes, but lawfully through vertue a continuall gouernment, being fimply apparelled with Arme to a poore gowne of smal price, & shewing him self a mortal enemy vnto all sorts of tyrants: hath """" left a race & noble of spring among the GRECIANS, which remaine yet vntill this present day, when we will be the control of th Contrarily also, there are fewe tyrants that doe viurpe the castells of free cities, that keepe so many fouldiers in pay that make fuch prouision for armor and weapon, & haue so many gates and drawbridges for the fafety of their persons, that in the ende can keepe them selves from violent death, no more then hares: nether doe leaue also any posteritie, house, or graue, why their memorie should be honored after their death. So Aratus having divers waies made sundry attempts, both by open force, and otherwise sodainely, to take the citie of Angos, and to thrust out the tyrant Aristippus: he euer fayled of his purpose, but specially one night among the rest, when he entred the citie very daungerously, with a fewe souldiers with him, and slue the fouldiers that came to give fupply to them that fought. But after that day was broken, and that the tyrant with all his forces came to fet vpon him: the ARGIVES sturred not at all, as if D Aratus had not fought for their libertie, but as though they had bene ludges appoynted to fit to fee the sportes of the games Nemee, to judge the game vnto the Conqueror without partiality, and with indifferency. Aratus in the meane tyme fighting like a valliant man, was thrust at with a pyke, and ronne through the thighe. This not with standing, at length he wanne that part of the citie where he fought, and was not thrust out till night, what force soeuer the enemies made vpon him: and if he could possibly haue holden it out all night, he had vndoubtedly obtayned his purpose. For the tyrant looked for no other but to flye, and had already fent divers of his goods to the fea. Howbeit no man once came to tell Aratio any newes of it. befides also lacking water, and for that he could not helpe him selfe bicause of his wound, he was driven to leade his men away, and fayled of his purpole. So, dispayring that he could ever E take it by stellth, he went thither with open warres, and spoyled and destroyed all the contry of Anoos: and having fought a great battell against the tyrant Artstippus, by the ryner of Cha-choust. res, they blamed Aratus much, that he for sooke the victorie, and cowardly retyred out of the Aratus much, that he for sooke the victorie, and cowardly retyred out of the battell. For the rest of his army doubtles had the better, and had followed the enemies farre in within chale: when he fled, being affrayd, not compelled by his enemies, but mistrusting his fortune, and retyred to his lodging. So, when they that returned from the chase of their enemies (whome they had ouercome and put to flight) to fette vppe markes of triumphe in token of victorie: Aratus beeing ashamed of it, determined to fight once agayne, for the markes of F triumphe. Whereuppon, resting his men but one daye, he led them agayne into the field, and fetting his armye in battell raye, offered to fight once more. This notwithstanding, when he fawe a great supply comming to his enemye, and that the tyrants men came to fight more were offended, for that they having put them to flight, and also flayne a greater number moe lustely, and with better corage then before: Aratus durst not abyde them, but retyred, and A fent to demaund leaue to take away his dead men to bury them. Yet he could speake so curteoufly, and behaue him felfe fo wifely, by the experience he had in gouernment, and also for the good will they bare him: that they forgat the fault he committed, and he wanne the citie of CLEONES ynto the ACHATANS, where he caused the feasites of the games Nemee to be celebrated, as belonging of great antiquitie, rather vnto the CLEONEIANS, then vnto the Ar-GIVES. This notwithstanding, the ARGIVES did keepe it also, and then was the first time that the fanctuary and priviledge was broken, which was wont to be graunted vnto all them that came to play for the games: bicause the ACHAIANS did make them prisoners that sought in Ar Gos as they returned through their contry, and fold them as enemies, So marueloully did Aratus and the Achaian's hate all forces of tyrants, without respect of pardon. Shortly after R he was advertised, that the tyrant Aristippus did lye in wayte to spye oportunitie, to take the citie of CLEONES from him: howbeit that he was affrayd of it, bicause he remayned at that tyme in CORINTHE. So Aratus straight sent out commaundement into every place, to asfemble the army of the trybe of the ACHAIANS, and that they should bring vittells with them for many dayes: and so craftily came downe to the citie of CENCHREES, to intile Aristippus, by his going away fo farre of, that in his absence he shoulde attempt to set vpon the CLEO-NIANS, as in deede he did. For the fayled not presently to goe thither with his armye. But Aratus returning from CENCHREES VIITO CORINTHE, very late in the night, and having layed good watcheeuery way: he fodainely brought the armye of the ACHAIANSVIITO CLEO-NES with fuch speede and quietnes, that they were not seene as they came, but entred into thecitie of CLEONES by night, and were ready to fight with the tyrant, before he knewe they were come. So the gates of the citie were fetopen by breake of daye, and the fignall of battell given by found of trumpetts: and fo fetting vpon the tyrants men with great cryes, they suspecting nothing, they were presently put to slight. And bicause the place where the ouerthrowe was given had many turnings: Aratus following the chafe tooke the way which he thought the tyrant fled in. The chase continued to the citie of Mychnes. There the tyrant was overtaken by a C RETAN called Tracileus, (as Dinias reporteth) who flue him: and there were flayne of his men also, aboue fifteene tho wland. But now Aratus having wonne such a famous victorie, and lost neuer a man: he could not yet winne the citie of ARGOS, nor set it againe at liberty. For one AEgias, and another Arillomachus, got into the towne with the kings D army, and kept it. But notwithstanding, by this noble victorie Aratus did race out a great part of the reproache they gaue him, and of the scoffes and slents the flatterers of the tyrants deuised of him. Who to please them, reported, that when they should come to fight in deede, the generall of the ACHAIANS had the winde collicke in his belly, and a dymnesse in his eyes with a guydines in his head, when he heard but the found of the trumpetts. And furthermore alfo, when he had fet his men in battell raye, and given them the word of battell: he asked the generalls if he should neede to be there in person, bicause he was hurt in the heele, and then would get him as farre of as he could to fee the ende of the battel. This talke was fo common, that the Philosophers them selues disputing of it, to wete, whether to tremble and change culler in present daunger and perill; be signes of a faint hart, or of an euill complexion and cold- B nes of body: they alway vouched Aratus, that had bene a good and valliant Captaine, and yet when he began to fight he was euer in that taking. So when he had ouercome Ariftippin, he fought meanes also to destroy Lysiadas MEGALOPOLITAN, who as absolute Lord and king of the contry, kept the city of MEGALIPOLIS. Notwithstanding, he had no base minde in him; nether was he caried away with a cruell defire of tyrannye to line at his pleafure, nor through extreme conetoulnes, as most Princes be but being a young man, & pricked forward with defire of honor & fame, & having vnaduifedly coceiued in his mind, (which was great & highly bent) the vaine reasons he heard men talke of principality, as of a state most blessed, & worthy of admiration: he found the meanes to make him felfe Lord of his contry. But afterwards, he was soone weary of the daungers & troubles such maner of gouernmet bringeth with it, & de- p fired to follow Aratus, whome he fawe prosper, and of great honor. Furthermore also, fearing his secret practises against him, he tooke holde of a noble deuile: first to rid him selfe of the

A malice and feare of the prison and garde of his souldiers: and lastly, to be a benefactor to his Lyfreday.gr. contrv. So he lent for Aratus, gaue vp his gouernment, and deliueted vp his citie to the trybe livelis leauth of the ACHAIANS. They so extolled him for this acte, that they choic him their Lieuetenant the grannie, generall of all their tribe, Wherefore, Lysiadas, striuing at the first to excell Aratus in honor, attempted divers things which were not very needefull: as amonge others, to make warre with his dominion, the LACED &MONIANS. But Aratus was very much against him in that, though some thinke it and the Awas for enuy. Thereuppon they chose Lysiadas generall of the ACHAIANS the second tyme:al-chaians. though Aratus openly both spake, and made what meanes he could to the contrary, & would haue had an other to haue bene chosen. For the him selfe was every other yeare generall. So Lyliadas was chosen againe generall of the ACHAIANS the third time, with enery bodies good will: and Aratus and he had absolute power and gouernment by turnes, one after the other.

But when they faw that Lyfiadas became open enemy vnto Aratus, and did still accuse him in Diffenion be all their counsels and assemblies: they fell in such misliking with him, that they rejected him. and 19stadate. For they thought his but a conterfeate vertue, to contend with the perfitnes of Aratus vertue. Much like vnto one of Isopes fables, saying that litle birdes did aunswer the cuckow on a tyme, sales of the asking them why they did flie from her: bicause we are affrayd (sayd they) thou wilt be a sper- Cuckone hawke one day. For when the ACHALANS would needes have fought voon the confines of the territo- Arasu mile ry of the MEGARIANS, and that Agis, king of LACED EMON, being come with his army to the counfell acampe of the tribe of the Achaians, did perswade them hardily to give battell : Aratus was Atolians, stowtely against it, and did abide many mocks and tawnts they gaue him, saying, that it was for cowardlines he would not goe. This notwithflanding, he would not leaue his wife and fafe determination for all that open shame: but suffered the enemies to passe ouer the Mountaine Gerania, and to inuade PELOPONNESVS, and would neuer fight with them. But afterwards, Gerania mons when he saw that at their first comming they had taken the citie of PALLENA: he then chauged his mind, and would deferre time no lenger to tary till all his power were come together, but marched forthwith against his enemies, with those few he had, who matuelously weakned them selues by their insolency and disorder after their victory, keeping no watche nor warde. n For after they had entred the citie of PALLENA, the foldiers ranne into euery house, one thru- reth von his sting in an others necke, and fighting for the goods they found. The Captaines also fell to ra- lastinious of uithing of maides, and the PALLENIANS wives, and put their burganets and morrions ypon nemies.

their heades, that none other should take them, bicause that by the same the souldiers should know whose they were, and to whome the women belonged. So they being in this ruffe and iolitie: newes came fodainly that Aratus was come. This made them quake for feare, when they faw they were like to be taken out of order. For before they all understoode of the daunger by their fodaine fetting on them, the ACHAIANS were fighting already within the suburbs and gates of the citie, against the first that resisted, whome they flue. They being broken, & put to flight, made the rest so affraid that were gathered together to ayde them, that they wish not E what to doe. In this tumult and great hurly burly, there was one of the Ladies a prisoner, that was the Daughter of Epigethes one of the noblest men of the citie, and she a maruelous good. The Citizens seeing her in that array, found her the goodlier to behold, and of greater maiefty, then any worldly creature. The enemies on the other fide were so affraid to see her, thinking she had bene some spirit: that not a man of them durationce desend them selves. So the PALLENIANS say, that the image of Diana all the test of Diana with the tyme is kept locked vp, and no body toucheth it, and that when the Nunne that keepeth the Pallent-

F it doth cary it diwhere, no man dare looke on it, but every man turneth his eyes away : bicause the fight of it is not onely fearefull and hurtfull vnto men, but it also killeth the frute of the trees it passeth by, and maketh them barren. This was the cause that then troubled the A-

TOLIANS mindes fo muche, bicause the Nunne remouing the image of the goddesse Diana, A the turned it towards them. How beit Aratus in his commentaries maketh no mention of this at all, but onely writeth that when he had defeated the ÆTOLIANS, following them in chase. he entred hand ouer head with them that fled into the citie, out of the which he draue them, and flue feuen hundred of them. This noble victory hath bene efteemed amonge the chiefest afterwards: and the paynter Timanthes hath drawen and fet it forth in table very lively. This notwithstanding, bicause divers Princes and people did immediatly prepare force against the ACHAIANS: Agatus presently made peace with the ÆTOLIANS by the practise of Pantaleon, who bare great fivaye and authoritie amongest them. Furthermore, Aratus being defirous to fet the Athenians at libertie, he fodainly attempted to take the hauen of PIREA for the which the Achaians reproued him, bicause he had broken the peace they had made n with the MACEDONIANS. But Aratus in his commentaries doth stowtely denye that it was he, and layeth the fault vpon Erginus, by whose meanes he wanne the castell of the Acrocorinthe: faving that it was he, that of his owne minde did fet a scaling ladder to the wall. and that his ladder breaking under him, he fled upon it, and perceyuing he was followed neare by the enemies, he styll cryed out, Aratus, as if he had bene there, and by this pollieve mocked his enemies, and faued him felfe. Howbeit me thinkes this auniwer is not true. For it is not credible, that Erginus a private fouldier, and a Syrian borne, shoulde haue so greate an enterprise in his head, vales it had bene by Aratus consent and commaundement, who had given him men, tyme, and meanes to vindertake it. And this appeared playnely afterwardes. For, Aratus did not attempt it twyle or thryle onely, but oftener then fo (as those that extreamely defire a thinge) to take the hauen of PIREA on the sodaine, not giving over for once fayling, but rather imboldening him felfe agayne with good hope, bicause he mist it but litle, and that he came so neare the taking of it. And another tyme alfo amongest others, flying through the playne of Thriasia, he brake his legge, and was driven to have many incifions to heale it: fo that he was a longe tyme together caryed in his lytter to the warres. After that king Antigonus was deade, and that Demetrius his sonne succeeded him in the kingdome: he attempted then more earnestly then euer before, to set the citye of Athens at libertye, making small accompt of the MACEDONIANS. Aratus therefore beeing ouerthrowen in battell neare vnto PHYLACIA, by king Demetrius Lieuete-ATAINS ONEYnant, called BITHYS: and the rumor running straight abroad, that Aratus was deade, or D at the least that he was taken prisoner: one named Diogenes, Captaine of the hauen of Pr-REA, Wrote aletter vnto Corinthe, and commaunded the garrison of the Achaians that kept it, to deliuer the towne, for Aratus was deade. But he by chaunce was at the felfefame tyme in CORINTHE: fo that they which brought the letters went home with a mocke, without their purpose, and made all the companye meary. Furthermore, king Demetrius him felfe fent a gallye out of MACEDON, to bringe Arasus bound vnto him. The ATHENIANS them selves also to please the MACEDONIANS, exceeding all lightnes of flatterye, ware garlands of their heads a whole day together, in token of common toy, when newes was brought them of Aratus death. Aratus was so mad in his minde to heare this, that he brought his armye presently against them, even to the very suburbes of the Academy. Notwithstanding, E. at their earnest requests, he did no hursthere. And afterwardes, the ATHENIANS acknowledging his valliantnes, when king Demetrius dyed: it tooke them in the heads to recouer their libertie againe. So Aratus, though that yeare another man was generall of the ACHAIANS, and that he kept his bedde, lying ficke of a longe disease: yet to further this, he was caried to A-THENS in alytter, and so perswaded Diogenes, Captaine of the garrison there, that for the fumme of a hundred and fifty talents (towards the which Aratus gaue of his owne, twenty talents) he made him deliuer the ATHENIANS the hauen of PIREA, the castell of MVNY-CHIA, the Ile of SALAMINA, and the castell of SVNIVM. After this, the ÆGINETES, the HERMIONIANS, and the moste parte of ARCADIA it selfe, did presently loyne with the A-CHAIANS: fo that the MACEDONIANS beeing occupied with warres at that tyme in ou B ther places agaynst their neighbours, the power of the Achaians marrielously increafed, having also the ÆTOLIANS their confederates. Then Aratus to performe his olde promise,

A promise, and being angrie to see the citie of ARGOS (being so neere neighbour vnto them) yet kept in bondage: he fent vnto Aristomachus, to perswade him to be contented to set his citie againe at libertie, and to joyne it to the tribe of the Achaians, as Lyliadas had done his towne of MEGALIPOLIS, and rather too like to be made a Generall with honor and praise of fo great and famous a state as the ACHAIANS: then tyran of one only citie, hated, and euerie hower of the night and day in daunger of his life. Aristomachus gaue eare to his perswasions, Aratus by and sent vnto Aratus, telling him that he had neede of fiftie talentes to discharge the souldiers delivered he had about him: The money was straight prepared. And Lysiadas that was at that time Ge- Area from nerall of the ACHATANS, and that maruelouslie desired this matter might be brought to passe promise. by his meanes: he secretile sent vnto Aristomachus to accuse Aratus, and shewed howe he had B bene alway a mortall enemy vnto tyrans, and therefore counfelled him rather to put him felfe into his hands, as in deede he did. For, Lyfiadas brought Ariftomachus vnto the counfell of the A CHAIANS. There all the counfell plainlie shewed their good wills, and the confidence they The lane and had in Aratus: for when he spake against it, that they should not receive Aristomachus, they rea faith of the lected him with great anger. But afterwards also when Aratus was wonne, and that he began and chains to moue the contrarie to the counfell: they straight agreed to receive the Angry Es, and the PHLIASTANS in league with them, and also the next year following, they chose Aristomachus Lieutenaunt generall of all their tribe. Aristomachus seeing him selle in credit nowe with the ACHAIANS, would needes inuade the contrie of LACONIA with a maine armie, and fent for Aratus being then at Athens. Aratus wrote vnto him, and wished him in any wife notro C meddle with that iorney, bicause he would not have the ACHAIANS to deale with Cleomenes, king of LACED EMON, that was a coragious and stowt young Prince, and maruelouslie growen in short time. Howbeit Aristomachus being selfe willed in that poynt, Aratus obeyed him. and was there in person all that iorney. So Cleomenes being come to them uppon the sodaine with his armie, neere vnto the citie of PALANTIVM: Aristomachus woulde needes fight with him. But Aratus disswaded him from it. Whereupon Lysiadas afterwards accused him to the ACHAIANS, and the next yere following he contended with him, fuing to be Generall howbeit he was rejected by most voyces, and Aratus chosen Generall the twelfth time. The felle same yeare he was ouerthrowen in battell by Cleomenes, neere vnto the mountaine Lycauin, frame onere and being fled, wandered up and downe in the night, that euerie man thought he had bene thrown in

D flaine, and it ranne for good payment among all the GRECIANS. Howbeit he faued himselfe, butel by king and having gathered his men together againe, not contenting him that he had scaped with hard by the life, but wilelie taking the oportunitie and occasion offered, no man knowing it, nor miltru- mountaine fting his comming: he fodainlie went to affaile the MANTINIANS, which were confede rats of Cleomenes, and having taken the citie of MANTINEA, he left a great garrison in it, and the citie of MANTINEA, made the straungers that were there, free of the citie. Thus dratus was he alone, that being Manimea. ouercome wanne the A CHAIANS that, which they them selves could scarcelle have worned if they had bene conquerors. Afterwards, the LACED EMONTANS invading the territories of the MEGALOPOLITANS with a great armie, Aratus foddinliewent thithes waide themsbur would hazard battell no more, nor geue Cleomenes vantage, who defired only to fight; and fill E constantlie relisted the MEGALOPOLITANES, that prouded him to come ato the field. Por besides that in nature he was not meete for a set battell, at that time also he was the weaker in men, and had to doe with a venterous young man, that was all fire : where his corage and ambicion on the other fide was coole, & quiet enough. Furthermore he confidered, that as king Cleomenes fought honor by valliant ventering, which he had not before: euen fo it was his parte wifelie to keepe that which he had long fince gotten, and to stande vppon his gardand fafetie. This notwithstanding, the light armed men being pur out into the fielde, and having chased the LACED EMONIANS even into their campe, & entring in with the hand over heads Aratus would never bring out his citizens, but stayed them in a great valley that lay betwene them both, and would not let them come on any further. Wherewithall Lyfallar being mad F with him felfe, and falling out with Aratus : he called for the horfemen, & fayd that he would contrie. So having gotten a great number of choyle horlemen together, he went with great A furie, and gaue charge of the right wing of his enemies battell, and having difperfed them, and put them to flight, he vnaduifedlie followed them with great corage, into cuill fauoured crooked wayes, among trees, and great broade ditches. Whereuppon Cleomenes came, and The death of fo luftely fet on him, that he flue him dead in the place, valliantly fighting and defending him felfe. The other men of armes flying also, rushed in againe into the battell of the sootemen, and so disordered their rankes, that they made all their armie flie for feare. For this cause they greatly blamed Aratus, bicause he had for saken Lysiadas: and being forced vnto it by the A-CHATAN'S that went without his leave, he followed them at length, and fled him felfe also vnto the city of Æ G IV M. There the ACHAIANS fitting in counfell, they decreed that they would furnish Aratus with no more money, neither would they pay his straungers any more: & bad B him pay them at his owne charge, if he would enterteine them for the warre. Aratus perceiuing they did him great wrong, stoode euen indifferent to deliuer vp his commission of Lieutenancy, and to discharge him selfe of his office : but after he had bethought him selfe better, he bare it pacientlie, and led the ACHAIANS directlie to the citie of ORCHOMENB. There he valliantlie fought with Megistonus, king Cleomenes father in lawe, and had the vpper hande of him: for he flue three hundred of his men, and tooke Megistonus selfe prisoner. Furthermore, where before euerie fecond yeare they did vie to choose him their Lieutenant generall:when his turne came about againe, they called him to gene him the office, but he refused it, and Timoxenus was chosen in his roome. Now the cause alleaged for his refusall, was sayd to be, for that he milliked of the common people. But that foundeth like a lye: for the trueth of it, to C my feming was for that he faw the state of the Achaians to decline. For king Cleomenes proceeded no more faver and foftlie as he did at the first, when he was controlled and brideled by the Ephori: but having flaine them, and equallie devided the landes through all LACED E-MONIA, and made the straungers free citizens of Sparta, being then absolute Lorde of La-CED EMON the straight set upon the ACHAIAN'S with all the power he coulde, and sought to conquer them. And therefore Aratus deserveth inft reproofe, for that he forsooke his contrie in such extreame trouble & dauger, that being as the maister of a shippe he gaue an other the sterne to steare, when it had bene most honorable & meetest for him to have taken it in hand (though they would not have given it him) to have faued his contry. Or otherwise, if he had in dede viterly dispaired of the good successe of the Achaians, he should then have put it ra- D ther into Cleomenes handes, and not to have poyloned Peloponnesvs againe, with the manets of the barbarous people: (bringing in as he did, the garrison of the MACED ONIANS, filling the castell of the Acrocorinthe with GAVLES and ILLYRIAN fouldiers, and making them his his shippe, in Lordes and manters, whom he had so often ouercomen in warres, and deceived of their gonernment, and of whom he also spake so muche euill in his Commentaries) nor to have put them into townes, and calling them frends and confederates, to thinke thereby to colour and difguise his wicked practise. Admit Cleomenes had bene a tyran, and a cruell man (if I should fo teasure him) set came he of the blood of Hercules, and was borne in Sparta; from whence they should rather have chosen the meanest man Gouernor, then the greatest king of MACEman of Spar. DON, and tholo speciallie that preferre the honor and glorie of GRACE, before straungers. E Yet king Cleomenes required no more of all the ACHAIANS, but the name onely to be their for the gras. Lieutenaunt generall: and so they woulde graunt him that honor, he promised he would be 1eft Prince of verie good vnto the cities confederats to ACHAIA. Where Antigonus notwithstanding, when they had chosen him their Lieutenaunt generall with absolute power and authoritie, both by fea and by lande, refused the charge, vnlesse they would let him haue the castell of the Acrocorinche for his hyer. The which was even like to Esopes hunter, that brideled his horse. For he would not get up you the Achains that requested him, and that by their Ambassadors, and decrees of counfell did referre all to him felfe: before he had first faddled and brideled them, by the garrifon he made them receive, and the pledges he caused them to geve him. and yet be spake as much as might be to cleere him selse of the accusacion against him, bea- F ring them in hande that he was forced to it. After this lungula C letter, Cleomenes sent desyance by a Heraulde vnto the Achaians, and proclaimed open possed bewarre against them: insomuche as he had almost gotten the citie of Sicyons by practife of mener and traitors. Howbeit failing of his purpose, he returned sodainly, and went vnto the city of Para draun. After that, the Argiver and PHLIASIANS willinglie yeelded vnto him, fo that of all that which the Acharans had conquered, and joyned vnto their tribe, they could reckon of nothing elfe of certainty without help Then Aratus was maruelouslie troubled in his mind, to see all PELOPONNES VS in turnilband vprore, and that all the cities fell to open rebellion by those that practifed change and alreracion. For no man was contented with the state and government at that time, but divers of D the Sicyonians & Corinthians both were bewrayed which had fecretlie practifed with Cleomenes, and that of long time maliced the government of the Achaians, desiring them felues to be Lords and Gouernors of their cities. Then many rose vp against him, and did both reproue & initations francis in intreate him. But Aratus with a stayed countenaunce and gentle words, prayed them to keepe damger. their places, and not to crie out in suche rage vpon their feete, and withall, caused their also to come in that were at the temple dore. But as he spake vnto them, by litle and litle he drew backe out of the presse, as though he ment to have geven his horse to some bodie to hold. So being gotten out of the presse, he gently spake without any seare vnto the Conin Tailwishe Arona soulsmet, and bad them goe to the temple of Apollo. When he was come to the castell, he then for the when he dainly tooke his horse backe, and commaunded Cleopater, Captaine of the garrison of the Az fed out of CHAIANS there, to looke well to the fafe keping of the castell. Thence he failed vnto Ao IV M, where the diet or parlament was kept: and there it was refolued, that they should sende for Antigonus, and deliuer the castell of the Acrocorinthe into his hands. And so it was performed; for Aratus sent thither his owne forme among the other oftages. The CORINTHIANS were fo fore offended withall, that they E made hauocke of his goods, and gaue his house he had in Coninthe, vnto king Cleomenes. So king Antigonus being onwardes on his way to come into PELOPONNESUS with his armie, bringing with him twentie thowfand footemen, all MACED ON IANS, & foure hundred horsemen; Aratus, with the greatest states and officers of the Achaians, vinwitting to their enemies, went to meete him as farre as the citie of Phohs, having no great trust nor confidence in Antigonus, nor the MACED ONIANS. For he remembred verie well, that he came first to his greatnes, by the injuries he had offered them: and howe that the chiefest cause of his rising, was the malice he bare vnto olde Antigonus, Howbeit, making vertue of necessitie, and weying the instant occasion of their present extremitie: (of Gouernors, to be driven to be subiects) he put him felfe in aduenture. the loffe of Aratus, whom they had let go. So king Cleomenes joyning vnto him all the people

them selves, holdes and townes into his hands: he then intrenched in the castell of the Acrocorinthe with a great trench. Furthermore, when Aratus came to the citie of Sicyone, many of the Achaians gathered about him, and holding a counfell and affemblie, he was chofen their Lieutenaunt generall, hauing absolute power and authoritie to doe what he would, and gaue him of their owne citizens to gard his person. So, he having managed the affaires of when he fent vnto the ÆTOLIANS for side, they flatly denied him, and would fend him none.

Furthermore, the ATHENIANS being verie defirous to fend aide for Aratus fake, were diffwa-ded from it through the practife of Euclidas, & Micion. Aratus also had a house in Corinthe, where all his money was: the which king Cleomenes at the first meddled not withall, neither ftoode doutfull how to determine, whether he should receive king Antigonus or not: bicause Antigonus would not aide him, before he delivered him the castell of the Acrocorinthe into use more then any other mans, in all matters, not onely touching the affaires of the Achai-

A enterteinment. Afterwardes also, finding him a good and discreete man: he fell into inward frendshippe and familiaritie with him. For Aratus was not onely skilfull to geue direction in matters of state touching good order and gouernment: but moreouer, his companie & conuersation was verie pleasaunt, to entertaine a Princes leasure with. Wherefore though Antigones was but young at that time, yet feeing throughly into Aratus nature, and that he was a meete man to be well thought of, and esteemed about a Prince: he vsed his counsell and ad-

ANS, but of the MACEDONIANS also. And so all things came to passe, which the goddes had promifed in their facrifices. For in a beaft that was facrificed, there were two galles wrapped Anoder Bos.

in one felfe cawle: the which the Soothfayers interpreted did prognofticate, that two which wed to Ava-B before were mortall enemies, should nowe become affured frendes. But Aratus made no account of their prediction, neither did also gene any credit to the sacrifices, but trusted more to his owne determination. So, the warres afterwardes having good fuccesse, and Antigonus making a feast in the citie of CORINTHE, where he had bidden many ghests: he would nedes haue Aratus lye vpon him at the table, and a litle while after, commaunded his men to bring him a couerlet, and turning to him, asked him if he were not a colde. Aratus aunswered him, it freezed. Then Antigonus bad him come neerer him: & when the servaunts brought a couerlet for the king, they cast it ouer them both. Then Aratus remebring the sacrifice, fell a laughing, and told the king what a wonder he had feene in the facrifice, & what interpretation the Soothfavers made of it. This was long after. So, Antigonus and Aratus being at that time in Antigonus

C the citie of PEGES, they were sworne brethren together: and then went both with all speede and Aratus against the enemies. Thus there fell out hot skirmishes betwene them, hard by the citie of furne bre-

CORINTHE. For Cleomenes was verie well fortified, and the Corinthians valliantly defended them selues. In the meane time, Aristoteles of A a G os, (Aratus frend) secretile sent him word, that he would make the citie rebell, if he came him felfe with any number of fouldiers. Aratus tolde it vnto king Antigonus, who gaue him fifteene hundred men, with the which he imbarked, and passed ouer with great speede from the Isthmus (or barre in the straight) vnto the citie of EPIDAVRVM. Howbeit the ARGIVES taried not Aratus comming, but were all vp before he came, and did fet you king Cleomenes men, and had driven them into the castell. Cleamenes being aduertised of it, and fearing least his enemies (keeping the citie of ARGOS)

D should cut of his way from returning into his contrie againe with safetie if he were driven to a straight: he for sooke the castell of the Acrocorinthe, and went his way by night to helpe his men in the citie of ARGOS. So he came thither in time, and ouerthrewe certeine of his enemies. But shortly after, Aratus, and king Antigonus both being comen thither with all their aide, Cleamenes was driven to flie to the citie of MANTINEA. After the recovery againe of the The citie of citie of Argos, all the refidue of the cities of Peloponnesvs did againe returne to the A-registered from CHAIANS, and Antigonus tooke the castell of the Acrocorinthe. So Aratus being chosen Ge- Clemente. nerall by the ARGIVES, he counselled them to present Antigonus with all the tyrans goodes, and those that had bene traitors to the common wealth. And after they had cruellie tormented the tyran Aristomachus in the citie of CENCHREES, in the ende they cast him into the sea, drowned in E and drowned him. Aratus was maruelouslie reproued for his death, that he woulde suffer the the fea. pobre man to be so vilely handled, that was a good man, and one that had done him great mic for Aris pleasure: who through his persivation willinglie resigned up his tyrannie, and deliuered the somachus.

city of ARGOS vnto the ACHATANS. But besides this, they blamed him for many other things elfe. For that the Achaians through his meanes had put the citie of Corint he into Antigonus hands, as though it had bene some meane village: for that when they had sacked the citie of ORCHOMENE, they suffered him to place a garrison of the MACED ONIANS there: for that they had enacted by parlament, that they should neither write, nor sende Ambassadors any whether, without Antigonus privitie and consent: furthermore, for that they were compelled to geue pay to the MACEDONIANS: for that they made facrifices, feastes, and games

F vnto Antigonus, as if he had bene a god, following the example of Aratus citizens, who were the first that began, and had received Antigonus into the city by the perswasion of Aratus, that lodged and feasted him in his owne house. With all these faults they burdened Aratus, and confidered not that after they had put the revnes of the government into Antigonus hand. A- A ratus him felfe (whether he would or not) was compelled to follow the fwing of the vnbridled Prince, having no other meanes to stay it, but onely the libertie of speache to admonish him; and that also was not to be exercised, without apparant and great daunger. For it is most true. that many things were done greatly against Aratus minde, as amongest others: that Antigonus caused the tyrans images of ARG os to be set vp, which he had before pulled downe: and alfo that he made them to be ouerthrowen, which Aratus had fet up for those that had taken the castell of Corinthe, and onely left Aratus owne statue, notwithstanding all the earnest intreaty Aratus made to the contrarie, yet he could get no graunt of any thing he requested. Besides also, it appeareth that the ACHAIANS delt not so frendly with the MANTINIANS, as became GRECIANS one to an other. For they having the citie in their handes by Antigonus B meanes, did put all the noblest and chiefest men of MANTINEA to death, others they solde as flaues, and fent the rest into MACED ON with irons on their legges, and brought the poore women & children into bondage, and fold them for flaues: and of the money they got by fpoile. they deuided the third parte among them felues, and left the other two partes vnto the Ma-CEDONIANS. Nowe furely it can not be fayd, but this was done for fome cruell revenge. For though it was an ouergreat crueltie, in rage & passion of minde, to handle people of one selfe blood and language in this lamentable forte: yet, as Simonides faith, when men are driven and forced to it, it is a gentle (no cruell) thing, to ease their great stomackes instanted with rage and malice. But for that which was done afterwards vnto the citie, no man can excuse Aratus. nor fay that he was either driven to it by necessitie, or that he had otherwise any honest occa- C fion to doe it. For king Antigonus having geven the citie of MANTINEAVING the ARGIVES. they determined to make it a Colonie, and chose Aratus their Generall: who made a decree, that thenceforth the citie should no more be called MANTINEA, but ANTIGONIA, as it beacalled Antigo reth name vnto this day. Thus it feemeth that gentle MANTINEA (for fo the Poets called it) was vtterlie destroyed, and bare the name of an other citie through Aratus meanes, preferring the name of him that destroied the city, & did put all the inhabitants of the first to death. After that, king Cleomenes being ouerthrowen in a great battell by the citie of SELLASIA, he left the citie of Sparta, and fled into Æ GYPT. So Antigonus having yfed Aratus with all kind of honorable curtefie, he returned agains into MACEDON. There falling ficke, he fent Philip that should succeede him in the kingdom (being a young strippling growen) into, PELOPON- D NESVS, and straightly charged him speciallie to followe Aratus counsell, and to imploy him when he would speake vnto the cities, and become acquainted with the ACHAIANS. So Aratus having received him in that forte, made him so well affected and louing towardes him, that he sent him againe into MACEDON, being throughlie determined to make warres with GRECE. So after the death of Antigonus, the ATOLIANS beganne to despise the carelesnesse and cowardlinesse of the Acharans (bicause that they being acquainted to be desended by ftraungers, and having bene altogether governed by the armies of the MACEDONIANS, they liued verie idlely & diffolutely) whereupon they tooke vpon them to make them selues Lords of PELOPONNESUS. So they affembled an armie, and by the way as they went, they onely tooke some pray and spoyle vpon the lands of the PATREIANS, and the DYMEIANS: but in- E uading the territorie of MESSINA with all their armie, they destroyed the whole contrie before them. Aratus being angrie withall, and perceiuing that Timoxenus (who at that time was Generall of the ACHATANS) did still tract and delay time in vaine, bicause he was upon his going out of his yeare: he being appointed Generall for the yeare following, did anticipate his time fine dayes before, to goe and aide the MESSENIANS. Wherefore, leaning an armie of the Achaians, whose persons were nowe neither exercised in armes, nor yet had any defire Aratus ouer. to goe to the warres : he was ouerthrowen by the citie of CAPHYES. Nowe, bicause it was thought that he went somewhat too hottely and coragiouslie to the warres, he so extreamely battell, by the cooled againe, and left things in fuch case, that all hope being cast a side, he suffred the Ær ocitie of Ca-LIANS in maner to tread Peloponnesus under their feete, before his eyes, with all the info- F lencie and crueltie that might be possible, notwithstanding that they fundrie times gaue him great aduauntages of them. Thus were the Achaians once againe forced to pray aide out

A of MACEDON, and to fend for young king Philippe to make warres in GRECE: hoping for the The Achaids loue he bare vnto Aratus, and the great trust he had in him, that he woulde vie them gently, fent for king and doe as they woulde have him. But then first of all beganne Apelles, Megareus, and a few gonus forms. other Courties to accuse Aratus: vnto whome king Philippe geuing easie care, he procured that one Eparatus, of contrarie faction vnto Aratus, was chosen Generall by the Achar-ANS. Howebeit this newe Generall Eperatus beinge extreamelie hated by the ACHAIANS. and Aratus also leavinge to deale any more with matters of state: no actewas done to a ny purpose. Whereuppon king Philippe findinge his faulte, returned againe vnto Aratus. and was ruled altogether by him: and when he found that his affaires prospered in all things he went about, he then lette him alone withall, as from whome came all his honour and B greatnesse. Thereuppon eueric man esteemed Aratus a wise Gouernour, not onely to rule a common wealth, but also a whole realme and kingdome. For his manners, intent, and chiefest purpose appeared, in the deedes of this young king, as a riche colour that did sette foorth and beautifie them. For the clemencie this young Prince Philippe vied to the LACE-DEMONIANS, that had offended him : the great curtefie he shewed to the CRETANS, whereby in fewe dayes he wanne all the Ile of CRETA: and the iorney he made against the ÆTO-LIANS, which was a wonderfull great exployt: wanne the Prince great fame, for following good counsell, and Aratus accounted to be a wife Gouernour, and of deepe understan- Aratus, a wife good counteil, and Aram accounted to be a wife Southhold, and of deepe vindertainding. King Philippe when he knewe it, was so offended therewith, that he did condemne them in the summe of twentie talentes: and afterwardes also, bicause they troubled his affaires, he did put them to death. But king Philippe in the ende being puffed vp with the good fortune and successed this warre, which prospered as he woulde have it: he then grewe to be couetous, and beganne to thewe his naughtie nature, and to bewray his diffimulacion wherewith he difguifed him felfe: and by litle and litle to make his vices plainlie to appeare. For first of all, he abused young Aratus wife, which was kept secret a long time, bicause he lay in their house, and beganne dayly to growe more seuere and cruell to the common weales: and then the D worlde sawe plainlie, that he cared no more for Aratus. The second facrifice al- Aranu mee fo was done by Aratus fonne, who was girt about with a cloth, not altogether white, but mingled with purple colour. So during the facrifice, they fong hymnes upon the harpein praise of him, and the maister of the Musitians made a procession round about being accompanied part of the honors that were appointed to be done vnto him, were left of by processe of time. & chaunge of things that followed afterwards. Thus you fee what the life of Aratus the father D hath bene, as we find in histories. Now Philip being a wicked man, and cruell of nature, caused Themilerable his sonne Aratus also to be poysoned, not with a deadly poyson, but with such poyson as trous-death of arat his sonne Aratus also to be poysoned, not with a deadily poyson, out with furth poyson as a tou-bleth a mans wits so, that through their deuelish receit, he becometh a starke toole without a-Straing? ny wit at all, and maketh him to attempt straunge and abhominable things, and to have cer- kindes of pole tralls of the oxe which they had facrificed, he tooke it him felfe with both his hands and shewed them vnto Aratus, and to Demetrius Phalerian, now turning to the one, then vnto the other, and asked them what they judged of these signes of the sacrifice: whether he shoulde keepe the castell to him selfe, or else deliuer it to the MESSENIANS, Demetrius sinvling aunfwered him; if thou beeft of the Soothfayers minde, then thou shalt deliver it vp; but if thou hast a kinges minde in thee, thou shalt then holde the oxe by both hornes. (By the oxe, he ment the contrie of PELOPONNESVS, and moreover, that if he kept both these castells of Ithome, and the Acrocorinthe, all Peloponnes vs were wholly at his commaundement.) Aratus still held his peace, and fayd not a word. In the end, Philip praying him to speake he said. R In CRETA, and in the contrie of the BOROTIANS and PHOCIANS, there are many strong castells scituated on high hills from the vallies. Moreouer, there are also many places of great strength in the marches of the ACARNANIANS, both within maine land, as also vpon the sea coast: of all the which thou hast not taken one of them by force, and yet they all doe willinglie obey thee notwithstanding. It is for theeues to hyde their heades in high rockes & mountaines: but a king can have no stronger castell, then the love, faith, and good will of men. That is it that opened the fea of CRETA. That is it that hath brought thee into PELOPONNEsys. Those are the meanes which have made thee being so young a man, some of them to choose thee their Captaine, and others also to make thee their absolute Lorde and Maister.

Aratus going on with his tale, Philippe gaue the intralls againe to the Soothfaver that brought C. them, and taking Aratus by the hand, (as if by force he had cast him out of the castell, and had also taken the citie of MESSINA from him) sayd vnto him: come on then, lette vs euen take that course. But after that time, Aratus came as litle to the Court as might be, and so by litle and little left Philippes companie. For when he went to make warre in the realme of Epinys. he was earnestlie in hand with Aratus to goe that iorney with him. But Aratus prayed him to hold him excused, and so remained at home, being affrayed to be brought into an euill name with Philippes doings. For Philippe afterwards having shamefullie lost his armie by sea against the ROMANES, & befides, having had also verie euill successe in all other his affaires; he returned againe to Peloponnesvs, & thought once more to have deceived the Messen IANS. But when they founde his practife, then he beganne with open force to spoyle their contrie. D Aratus then flatlie fell out with Philip, and viterly refused his frendship, for that he perceived then the injurie he had done his fonnes wife, the which grieued him to the harte, but yet he made not his fonne privile to it: bicause he coulde gette no other amendes, then to knowe what injurie had bene done to him, confidering that he had no way nor meanes to be reuen-Philip of a ged. For, king Philip was maruelously changed, and from a curreous and chast young Prince. becomen a vitious and cruell tyran: the which to speake truely, was not a chaunge or alteracame a cruell cion in nature, but a manifest declaracion (when he was no more affrayed of any man) of his wicked and deuelish mind, the which through feare had of long time bene kept secret. Now, to proue that Philips first love and good will he bare vnto Aratus, was also mingled with feare and reuerence: that which he did afterwards vnto him did plainly shew it. For he being defirous to put Aratus to death, not thinking him felfe free fo long as he lived, neither king, nor tyran: he durst not goe about to kill him him selfe, but procured one of his Captaines called Taurion, and commaunded him to make him away as fecretly as he could possible, & specially with poylon, in his absence. This Taurion fell in frendship with Aratus, and poyloned him Aratus boy-

die, and procure a pretie coffe which brought him into a consumption. Aratus knewe he was mtanes. poysoned, but bicause he sawe it booted not to bewray it, he bare it pacientlie, and made no words of it, as if he had had some naturall disease about him. Yet on a time, one of his chiefest frends being in his chamber, with him, who wondred to fee him fpit blood as he did; he told him, fred Caphalon mine, this is the reward of a kings loue. So he died of this poison in the city is of EGIVM, being the feuenteenth time chosen Generall of the ACHAIANS; who would have had him buried in the felfe fame place, and have made fome honorable monument for him.

with his office and affaires, but enery man only to keepe his fword sharpe, and to be quicke of hand against the enemy; and for the rest, to referre all to him, who would take sufficient order B for things of his charge and gouernment. Therefore Plato, that faith it litle prevaileth to have a good and wife Captaine, if the fouldiers also be not wife and obedient, thinking it as requifite for the vertue of obedience, to have men of a noble minde and good education, as otherwise it is meete for a Captaine to know how to direct and commaunde well, considering it is that which with lenity & mildnes doth mitigate all fury and choller: he hath divers other examples and fufficient proofes to proue his words true, and namely, the great miseries and calamines which came to the ROMANES after the death of Nero, do plainly shew, that nothing is more daungerous nor dreadfull in an Empire, then a great armieliuing licentiouslie and diforderly, For Demades after the death of Alexander the great, compared Alexanders armie, VINO Crelops Polyphemus after his eye was put out: confidering howeblindly and loofelie they C were gouerned. Howebeit the Empire of Rome being deuided into fundrie factions at one felfe time, and rifing against it selfe in many places, it fell into the like missortunes and calamities fained of the Poets by the TITANS: not so much through the ambiciousnes of the Emperours, as by meanes of the couetoufnes & infolency of the fouldiers, who draue the Emperours out of their Imperial feates one after an other, as one naile driueth out an other. And Disconflue also the tyrapne of Stellta, was wont to call Pheraus, who had bene onely tyran of THESSALY tenne monethes space: a tyran in a play, deriding his so sodaine chaunge of state. But the Imperial house of the Casars at Rome received source Emperours, in lesse then tenne monethes space, the souldiers now putting in one, and then taking out an other, as if they had

A bene in a play on a scaffolde. So that, the ROMANES being thus grieuouslie oppressed, had yet this comfort: that they needed not to seeke to be renenged of them that did oppresse them. For they sawe one of them murther an other, and him first and most justilie of all other murthered, that had first of all corrupted the souldiers, in teaching them to make gaine of the chaunge of Emperours: and so depraying a worthie deede of it selfe, which was their forfaking of Nero: and mingling it with briberie, made it plaine treason. For Nymphidius Sabinus, Nymphidius being Captaine of the Emperours gard, which are called the Prætorian fouldiers, together

For the leavying of which fumme, they could not possiblie doe it, but they must needes committeene thowsand times more extorcion to euery bodie, then Nero had done. This large promise made them presently put Nero to death, and thortly after him, Galba him felfe also. For the fouldiers for fooke Ne- The house of their wished hope, one of them destroyed an other by treason and rebellion. But nowe to set downe all thinges particularlie which hapned at that time, it were to wryte one whole entere C historie: and therefore, I will content my selfe, not to passe ouer wih silence the notablest deedes and lamentable calamities which happened at that time vnto the Cefars. It is manifestly knowen to all men, that Sulpitius Galba of a private man, was the richest and The sease wealthieft that came to be in the number of the Cefars: who, though he came of a verie noble and walking him felle from the race and family of the Ceruitae he was honored the more of Came. house, deriving him selfe from the race and family of the Serui, yet he was honored the more, bicause he was a kinne vnto Quintus Catulus, who for vertue and estimacion, was one of the chiefest men of his time, albeit that otherwise, he willingly rezined his authoritie and power unto others. So Galba thereby was fomwhat a kinne unto Laura, the wife of Augustus Cafar, and therefore for her sake he came out of the Emperours pallace, when he went to take possession of his Confulthippe. Moreouer, it is reported, that when he had charge of the armic in Gran-D MANIE, he did valliantlie behaue him selfe. And in the gouernment of LIBYA also, where be was Viceconful, he did as honorablie behaue him selfe, as any man whatsoever. How beit his Galbare make meane and fimple ordinary of dyet, voyde of all exceffe, was imputed mifery & niggardlines in "". him, when he was proclaimed Emperour bicause the praise of sober & temperate dien which he would have brought in vie, was then fo raw a thing, that it was taken for a new & fraunge deuise. He was sent Gouernor also into Spayne by Nero, before he had learned to be affrayed of the citizens of great authority: howbeit, besides that he was of a curedous & gentle nature; Gather the his age moreouer increased the opinion they had of him that he was timerous and searcfull,

For when the wretched officers of Nero did cruelly vexe & torment the provinces; and that it lay not in Galba any way to help them: yet was it fome comfort to them; which were underd & E fold as flaues by the officers, to fee that Galba did lament the miferies & calamines they endured, as if they had bene done vnto him felfe. So when any flaunderous rymes were made as gainst Nero, which were song up and downe in eueric place: he would neither forbid them. noryet was offended, as Neroes officers were. Therefore he was maruelouslichelouse in she contrie, with them that were acquainted with him : bicause he was then in the eighty eare of his gonernment as Proconful amongest them, at which time Junius Vindex being Property Junius Vin. of GAVLE, rebelled against Nero, who as it is reported, had written vnto Galba, before he entred into open action of rebellion. But Galba, did neither beleue him, nor also accuse & beyeray him, m nothing but a head and Gouernor, being a hundred thow and fighting men ready armed, and might also leavie a great number more of them. Then Galba consulted thereuppon with his frends, & among them, some were of opinion that he should stay a while, to see what change and alteracion would grow at Rome vpon this sturre. Howbeit Titus Iunius, Captaine of the Prætorian band, said vnto him: O Galba, what meaneth this so doutfull a deliberacion? Be not we wife men to call in question, whether we shall allowe of Vindex frendship, or accuse him? Yea, and with armes persecute him, that defired rather to have thee Emperour, then Nero tyranne ouer the estate of Rome? Afterwardes Galba by bills set vp euerie where, appointed a day certaine, to enfranchise suche as woulde make sute for it. This rumor slying straight abroad he gathered a great number of fouldiers together, that were verie willing to rebell: and R Sulpiniu Gal. he was no fooner gotten up into the tribunall or chaire of state, but all the souldiers did salute ba, fabuted by him, by the name of Emperour. Howbeit he was not content with this name at the first, but the fouldiers, accusing Nero, and lamenting the deathes of the noblest men whome he had cruellie put to death: he promised that he would imploy his best wit and discression to the seruice and benefit of his contrie, neither naming him selfe Cefar, nor Emperour, but only Lieutenant to the Senate, and state of Rome. Now, that Vindex did wiselie to call Galba to be Emperour, Nero him felfe in his doings doth witneffe it. Who having alwayes made a countenance as though he passed not for Vindex, & that he wayed not the rebellion of the GAVLES: when it was told him that Galba was called Emperor, he being the at supper, for spight he ouerthrew the table. Moreouer, though the Senate had judged Galba an enemie, yet Nero to be pleasaunt with his frends, made as though he was nothing affrayed of it, and faid, this newes made all for him, bicause he stoode in neede of money, & also that it was a happy occasion offred him to helpe him withall. For fayd he, we shall soone haue all the GAVLES goodes, as the spoyle of a inst warre, after we have once againe ouercomen and conquered them: and moreouer, Galbaes goods also would quickly be in his hands, that he might fell them, confidering that he was become his open enemy. So he presently commaunded Galbaes goods should be openly fold to them that would give most, Galba vnderstanding that, did also by sound of trompet sell all Neroes goods he had in all the prouince of SPAYNE, and did also finde more men readier to buy, then there were goods to fell. Daily men rose against Nero in enery contry, who tooke Galbaes parte, Clodius Macer only excepted in Africk, and Verginius Rufus in GAV LE, both of them D having charge of legions appointed for the fafe keping of GERMANY: and both of them did follow seueral directions by them selues, varying in minde & intent. For Clodius Macer having robbed much, & put divers men also to death through his cruelty & couetousnes: he shewed plainly, that he swamme betwene two waters, as one that could neither let go his charge, nor ver kept it. Verginius also on the other side, being Generall ouer great & mighty legions, who had fundry times called him Emperour, & did in maner force him to take vpon him the name and Empire: he notwithstanding did euer aunswere them, that he neither minded to take the Empire you him, nor yet to fuffer any other to do it, then fuch as the Senate should choose and call vnto the same. This at the first somwhat amazed Galba. But when both the armies of Vindex and Verginius, in fpight of their Captaines (who could not stay nor keepe them backe, E no more then cochmen can keepe backe the horse with their bridells) were joyned in a great battell together, where were flaine twenty thow and GAVLES in the field, and Vindex also flue him felfe shortly after it was genen out, that the conquerors after so great a victory obtained, would copell Verginius to take vpon him to be Emperour, or elfe that they would take Neroes part againe. Then Galba being not a little perplexed, wrote vnto Verginius, & perswaded him to ioyne with him, to hold up the Empire & liberty of the Romanes, & thereupon fled straight Colonia a citie into a city of Spayne called * Colonia, rather repeting him of that he had done, & wilhing for his wonted peaceable & quiet life wher with he was brought vp: then otherwise occupying him selfe about any necessary or proffitable thing for the surtherance of his enterprise. Now it was about the beginning of fommer, and one day towards evening, there came to Galba one of F his slaues infranchised, a Sicilian borne, that was comen fro Rome in seuen daies: who was derstanding that Galba was alone, went presently to his chamber dore & opened it, & coming

A in against the wils of the groomes of the chamber that stood at the dore, he told him that Neva being yet aliue, but fene no more, first the people of Rome, & then the Senate, had proclaimed him Emperor: & that immediatly after newes came that Nero was dead, the which he hardly beleuing notwithstanding, went thither him selfe, saw his body layed out upon the ground. & then made towards him with all speede to bring him these newes. These newes maruelously reusued Galba, and a multitude of men thronged thraight about his dore, which began to be coragious, seing him lively againe, although the speede of the Messenger seemed incredible, Howbeit two dayes after, Titus also arrived, with certaine other of the campe, who told Galba perticulerly what the Senate had decreed in his behalfe. So, this Titus was called to great honor, and the flaue enfranchifed had priviledge given him to weare ringes of gold, and he was B called Martianus Vicellus, who afterwards of all the infranchifed bond men, became the chiefest man about his Master Galba. In the meane tyme, Nymphidius Sabine began at Rous, not Sabine taketh couertly, but with open force, to take vpon him the absolute gouernment of the Empire, per- vpon him to fwading him felf that Galba was fo old, that he could hardly be brought in a lytter vnto Rome, be Emperor.

TORIANS which were in Rome, did beare him good will of long tyme, and their acknowledged none other Lord but him onely, for the large promife he had made them, for the which he received the thankes, and Galba remained the debter. So he presently commaunded Tigellinus, his companion and Captaine with him of the army of the PRETORIANS, to leave of his fword: and disposing him selfe to bancketing and feasting, he sent for all those that had bene being at the least three score and thirteene yeare olde: besides also, that the army of the P RM-

C Confuls, Prætors, or Proconfuls of prouinces, and made them all to be inuited in the name of Galba. So there were certaine fouldiers gaue out this rumor in the campe, that they should doe well to fend Ambassadors vnto Galba, to praye him that Nymphidius might betheir onely Captaine still, without any companion ioyned with him. Furthermore, the honor and good will the Senate bare him, calling Nymphidius their benefactor, and going dayly to visite him Honors done in his house, procuring him to be Author of all their decrees passed in Senate, and that he to Memphishould authorise them: this made him hie minded, and the bolder by much, insomuch that dist by the Sense, made shortly after, they that came to honor him in this fort, did not onely hate and mislike his do-bim group too ings, but moreouer he made them affrayd of him. Furthermore, when the Confuls had given bold and infoto commo purseuants any commissions under seale, or letters pattents signifying the decrees D of the Senate, to cary them to the Emperor, by vertue of which letters pattents, when the officers of the citie doe fee the feale, they straight provide the purseuants of coches and freshe horses to further their speede and hasty iorney: Nymphidius was very angree with them; bicause they did not also come to him for his letters, sealed by him and his souldiers, to sende likewise vnto the Emperor. But besides all this, it is also reported that he was like to have deposed the Consuls: howbeit they excusing them selves vnto him, and craving pardon, did and pease his anger. And to please the Commons also, he suffred them to pur any of Nerver friends Nove fried to death they could meete withall. Amonge other, they flue a Fenser called Spicillus, who me they put vnder Neroes statues, which they dragged vp and downe the citie, Another also call Nymphidia

So Nymphideus being comen in manner to the fulnes of his hope: he was very glad to heare that some repyned at him, bicause he was the some of Caius Casar, that was the next This was the next Emperor after Tiberius . For this Caius Cafar, when he was a young man, had kept Nymphidias tage of new mother, which had bene a fayer young woman, and the Daughter of one Callifus, one of Ca. 1 fars infranchifed bond men, whome he had gotten of a Laundres he kept. Howbeit it is found contrary, that this Nymphidius was borne before Caius Cafar coulde knowe his mother, and men thought that he was begotten by a Fenser called Martianus, with whome his mother

F Nymphidia fell in fancie, for that he had a great name at that time in Rome, and in deede Nymphidius was liker to him in fauor, then vnto any other. So, he confessed that he was the sonne of this Nymphidia, howbeit he did ascrybe the glory of the death of Nero vinto him selfe, and with the goods he enjoyed, nether for that he lay with Sporus whome Nere loued so dearely, whome he fent for to Neroes funeralls whileft his bodye was yet a burning, and kept him with him as if he had bene his wife, and called him Poppaus. Furthermore, all this did not content him, but yet fecretly he aspyred to be Emperor, partly practifing the matter in Rome it selfe, by the meanes of certaine women and Senators which were fecretly his friends: and partly also through one Gellianus, whome he sent into Spayne, to see how all thinges went there. Howbeit after the death of Nero, all things prospered with Galba, fauing Verginius Rusus only, who stoode doubtfull yet, and made him forely mistrust him, for that he was affrayd (besides that he was generall ouer a great and pullant army, having also newly overthrowen Vindex, and fecretly ruling the best parte of the Empire of ROME, which was all GAVLE, and then in B tumult and vorore, ready to rebell) left he would harken vnto them that perswaded him to take the Empire to him selfe. For there was no Captaine of Rome at that tyme so famous, and of lo great estimation as Verginius, and that deservedly for that he had done great service to the Empire of Rome in tyme of extreamitie, having delivered Rome at one felfe tyme from a cruell tyranny, and also from the daunger of the warres of the GAVLES. This notwithstanding, Verginius perfitting still in his first determination, referred the election of the Emperor vnto the Senate: although, that after the death of Nero was openly knowen, the common fort of fouldiers were earneftly in hand with him, and that a Tribune of the fouldiers (otherwife called a Colonel of a thowfand men) went into his tent with a fword drawen in his hand, and bad Verginius either determine to be Emperor, or els to looke to haue the sworde thrust C into him. Yet after that Fabius Valens, Captaine of a legion, was sworne vnto Galba, and that he had received letters from Rome, advertifing him of the ordinaunce and decree of the Senate: in thend, with much a doe, he perfivaded the fouldiers to proclayme Galba Emperor, who fent Flaceus Ordeonius to succeede him, vnto whome he willingly gaue place . So, when Verginius had deliuered up his army vnto him, he went to meete with Galba, on whome he wayted, comming on still towards Rome. And Galba all that time neither shewed him euill countenance, nor yet greatly esteemed of him, Galba him selfe being cause of the one who seared him, and his friends of the other, but specially Titus Junius: who for the malice he bare vnto Verginius, thinking to hinder his rifing, did vnwittingly in deede further his good happe, and delinered him occasion to draw him out of the civill warres and mischieues, (the which lighted after- D wards upon all the other Captaines) and to bring him to a quiet and peaceable life in his age. Furthermore, Ambassadors were sent from the Senate, and met with Galba at NARBONA, acitie of GAVLE: where after they had presented their humble duetie, they perswaded him to make all the hafte he could possible to shew him selfe to the people of Rome, who were maruelous destrous to see him. Galba received them very graciously and curteously, & made them great chere, howbeit very modeftly notwithstanding. For notwithstanding that Nymphidius had lent him divers Officers, and store of Neroes moveables: yet he would never be served with any of them, at any feasts or bankets he made, with other then his owne stuffe, wherein he shewed his noble mind, and how he could master all vanitie. But Titus Iunius shortly after told Galba, that this noble mind and civill moderation, without pride or pompe, was to lowly E a manner to flatter the people, and that it was a certaine respect of honestie that knewe not it selfe, and became not his greatnes and maiestie. So, he perswaded him to vie Neroes money & stuffe, and to be sumptuous and princely in his feasts, without niggardlines. To conclude, the olde man Galba began plainely to thew that he would be ruled by Titus Iunius: who aboue all other was extreame couctous, and besides too much given to women. For when he was a young man, the first time he went to the warres under Caluisius SABINB, he brought his Capgaines wife (which liked good felowshippe) disguised like a souldier into the campe, into his generalls tent (which the Romanes called Principia) and there was somewhat bold with her: Wherefore Caius Cafar committed him to prison but he escaped at his death. Another time, when he supped with Cloding Cafar, he stale a silver pot, Cloding hearing of it, bad him agains to F Supper the next night: but he commaunded his men they should give him drinke in an earthen cruse. Thus this their (through Colors pleasannines) seemed rather a matter of sport, then

A of anger: howbeit the faultes which he committed afterwards through extreame couetousnes of money, (at what time he ruled Galba, and bare all the swaye about him) gaug vnto some iust cause, and vnto others apparant culler of tragicall mischieues, and greeuous calamities, For Nymphidius, so soone as Gellianus was returned out of Spay Ne, whome he had sent thither Nymphidius to fee what Galba did: he enforming him that Cornelius Lacon was Captaine of the gard and house of the Emperor, and that Titus Iunius did all in all about him, and that he could never be suffred to come neare Galba, nor to speake with him a part, bicause those which were about Galba did mistrust him, & euer had an eye to him to see what he did, he was maruelously perplexed withall. Thereuppon he called for all the Centurions, Captaines, and pety Captaines of the campe of the PRETORIAN army, and persuaded them that Galba touching his owner B person, was a good old and discreete man, howbeir that he did not follow his owne aduise & counfell, but was ruled altogether by Iunius and Lacon, who marred all: and therefore, that it were good before they came to be of greater power, and to have such great authoritie in maneging the affayres of the Empire, as Tigellinus had before, to fend Ambaffadors to the Emperor in the name of all the campe, to tell him that in putting those two men from about him, he should be the better welcome vnto Rome, and to all men els besides. The Captaines vtterly misliked this deuise. For they thought it too straunge, and beyond all reason, to seeme to teache an old Emperor, as if he were but a child that did not know what it was to gouerne: & to appoynt him what fernaunts and friends he should keepe, and whome he should trust or mistrust. Nymphidius perceiuing this, tooke another course, and wrote letters vnto Galba to ter-C rifie him one tyme fending him word that he was maruelous euill beloued of many in Rome. and that they were ready to rebell against him: an other tyme also, that the legions of GER-MANY were revolted, and that he vinderstoode the like from the legions in Ivry and Syria. And another tyme alfo, that Clodius Macer in Africk stayed all the shippes fraighted with corne that were bound for Rome. But in the ende, finding that Galba made no accompt of him, and that he gaue no credit to his words nor writings: he determined first of all to set vpon him. Howbeit Clodius Celsus, borne in the citie of Antioch, a wise man, and his faithfull friend, disswaded him maruelously not to doe it: declaring vnto him, that he thought there was no one house nor family in Rome that would call Nymphidius, Casar. Howbeit in contrary manner, divers others mocked Galba and specially one Mithridates of the Realme of Pont, D that fayd he was a bald writhen man. For the Romanes (fayd he) hauehim in deede now in fome estimation, but when they have once seene him, they will thinke it a perpetuall shame and reproche to our tyme, that he was called Cafar . So they thought it good to bring Nymphidins about midnight into the campe, and there openly to proclayme him Emperor. Howbeit the chiefe Tribune of the fouldiers called Antonius Honoratus, gathered his fouldiers to- The oration gether in the night, and before them all did first openly reproue him selfe, and then them, for of Antonius that they had so often turned and chaunged in so short time, without any wit or discretion, tribune of with great store of torche light, and caried an oration in his hand, the which Ciconius Varro had made for him, and the which he had learned without booke to speake vnto the souldiers. But when he found the gates of the campe shut, and saw divers men armed vpon the walls, he began to be affrayd: and comming nearer, asked them what they ment by it, and by whose commaundement they had armed them selues as they did. Aunswer was made him by them all, that they did acknowledge no other Emperor but Galba: the which he feemed to like of, and also commaunded them that followed him to doe the like, and therewithall drew nearer. Whereuppon certaine of the fouldiers that warded at the gate, did open him the gate, and fuffred him to come in with a few men with him. Howbeit affoone as he was comen in, first there was a dart throwen at him, the which one Septimius that went before him received vp- R on his shield, & then others also came with their swords drawen in their hands to set on him. and followed him as he fled into a fouldiers cabbone, where they flue him. Then they layed his body in an open place, and rayled it about, that every man that would, might the next day

vp and downe in enery place. These were the men whome Nero had gathered together into one legion, and had taken them from the ower and made them fouldiers. So they were come thither to be futers to him, that he would allow them still to be fouldiers, and they pressed so arrogantly upon him, that they would not fuffer those which came to the newe Emperor, to fee him, nor speake with him : but they fell to tumult and vprore, crying out to have enfignes for their legion, and to be appoynted a place to lye in in garrison, Galba referred them ouer to another tyme, and bad them they should then let him understand their demaund. They told him againe, that this delay was a kind of deniall, and thereuppon fell to plaine mutinie, & followed him with great cryes: infomuch that some of them stuck not to draw out their swords. E Then Galba commaunded the horsemen he had about him, to set vpon them. So there was not a man of them that relifted, but fome of them were ouerthrowen, and troden under their horse seete: & others also slaine as they fled. This was a very euil signe and presage for him, to enter into Rome with fuch bloudshed, upon so many poore mens dead bodies as lay slayne on the ground. Howbeit, where fome before did despise and mock him for an old & feeble man, euery man then was affraid of him, and quaked for feare. Furthermore, bicause he would shew a great chaunge and alteracion from the vnreasonable vaine gifts and expenses of Nero; it seemeth he did many vncomely things. As when one Canus, an excellent player on the recorder. had played all supper tyme, bicause it was a maruelous sweete Musick to heare: he praysed & commended it marueloully, and commaunded one to bring him his casket, out of the which he tooke a few crownes, & put them into his hand, faying, that it was not money of the common treasure, but of his owne. Furthermore, he gaue straight commaundement that they

A should require and call backe againe the gifts Nero had geuen, and bestowed vpon common players, minstrells, wrestlers, and people of such kinde of facultie and profession, and to leave them only the tenth parte. But he got litle by this deuise. For the most parte of those that had giftes geuen them, had spent and consumed it all, as men that line without any rule or order, and spent at night that which they get in the day: and besides, they were to hunt after them that had either taken or bought any thing of them, and to make them to restore it againe. But this was an endles worke, for things had bene to conueyed from man to man, that in the end it came to an infinite number of mens hands. But of all this, the shame and dishonor returned to Galba him felfe, though the malice and hatred lighted on Titus Iunius: who only made the Emperour straight laced to all others, whilest he him selfe tooke vnreasonably of all men, ma-

As well when the veffell is full that it fill, As when it is emptie, thirft craueth drinke still.

But Iunius perceiuing Galba to be olde and feeble, woulde wifely take his fortune and time. while time ferued, supposing it almost to be at an end, so soone as he beganne to enter into it. So in the meane time he did much dishonor the poore old man, ouergreatlie abusing (vnder cloke of his authoritie) the chiefest and waightiest matters, in reprouing, or altogether himdering those, the which the Prince him selfe had a good defire to deale vprightly in, as to punish the officers of Nero. For he put some of them to death, among the which Elius was one, Galba killah and certaine other, as Polyelitus, Petinus, and Patrobius: whereat the people maruelouslie re- Reves fer-C ioiced, and cried out as they went to execucion through the market place, that it was a goodly and bleffed proceffion, and required Tigellinus of the goddes and men, that had bene chiefe maister and guide of all Neroes tyrannie. Howbeit the trimme man had gotten the vauntage, and had largely fed Iunius before: for afterwards he put poore Tertullianus to death, who had neither betrayed nor hated Nero, being as he was, & had neuer offended, nor was partaker of any of his wicked parts he played, when he was aliue. Wheras he that made Nero worthie of death, & that afterwards had also betrayed him : he was left alone, & nothing fayd vnto him. being a manifest proofe to all others, that they should not dout to hope to obteine any thing at Titus Iunius hands, fo they fed him with gifts. For the common people of Rome never defired thing fo much, as to fee Tigellinus to be caried to execucion: and they neuer left crying n out to demaund him in all affemblies of the Theater or thew place, vntil fuch time as the Emperour Galba did forbid them by proclamacion, the which declared that Tigellinus would not liue long, bicause he was ficke of a consumption of the lungs, which by litte & litte did weare him to nothing: and Galba prayed the people that they would not make his Empire tyrannicall and bloodie. The people were much offended with this, but yet they feemed to laugh at it: and Tigellinus did facrifice to the goddes for his health & fafetie, and prepared a sumptuous feast. Where Iunius rifing from supper, being set by the Emperour, went vnto Tigellinus to be merie with him, and tooke his daughter being a widdow with him, vnto whom Tigellimus dranke, and offred her a gift of flue and twentie Myriades of filuer: and commaunded one of his chiefest concubines to take a carcanet from her necke she wore, and to gene it the o-

E ther, being worth fifteene Myriades. After he had handled the matter thus, those things that were done vprightly and with inflice, were reprotted and taken in etill part: as the thing that was graunted to the GAVLES, bicause they did rebell with Vindex. For men thought that they were not discharged of the subsidies & taxes they were wont to pay, and that they were made free of Rome, so much through the bountie and liberalitie of the Emperour, as it was by Innius meanes, of whom they had bought it. For these causes the people hated the Emperour Galba. Howbeit the fouldiers still lived in good hope, for the gift that was promised them at the beginning, thinking that though they had not as muche as was promifed them, they should yet enjoy as muche as Nero had genen them. But Galba vnderstanding that they com- The noble plained of him, he spake a word meete for so noble and worthie a Prince as he was: that he v + signing of the letters. Wherefore Galba being affrayed, & mistrusting that they did not only despise him for his age, but also bicause he had no children: he determined to adopt some young gentleman for his sonne of the noblest house of the citie of Rome, and to proclaime him his successor in the Empire. At that time there was one Marcus Otho, of a noble house, but ever geven to sen-kept in for the reuerence they bare vnto the maiestie and person of Galba, who kept them that were defirous to rebell, bicause they sawe as yet no beginning of any chaunge or alteracion. This did formwhat smother and keepe in the shew of their wicked intent, But they which had before serued under Verginius, and were at that time under Flaceus in GERMANIE, thinking them selves worthie of great reward for the battell they had won against Vindex, and having nothing geuen them in recopence: they would not be pleafed with any thing their Captaine fayd vnto them, neither did they make any accompt of Flaceus, bicause he coulde not sturre him felfe, he was fo plagued with the gowte, and befides that, he had no maner of experience in warres. So one day when certaine sportes were made, at the bringing in of the which, the B Colonells and Captaines (according to the maner of the Romanes) made prayers vnto the Regions of the goddes for the health and prosperitie of the Emperour Galba: there were divers of them that made a novle at the first, and afterwardes when the Captaines continued on their prayers, in ring some respect to his wife, and being affrayed also of his mother, he had intifed Otho to be his bawde vnto her. Nero loued Otho dearely, and muche delighted in his companie, bicause he was fo good a fellow and free of his fleshe: and was verie glad sometime to heare howe he mocked him, calling him niggard. The report went, that as Nero on a time was novnting him felfe with pretions ovles and perfumes, he cast a litle youn Otho as he went by: who the next day made him a feast in his house, where sodainlie were thrust into the hall, divers vessells of gold and filuer full of this perfumed oyle, that rame out of them like conduit water, and did D wette all the hall. So Otho having first possessed, and abused her vnder hope of Neroes loue: he perswaded her to be dinorsed from her husband. The which she did and he received her home to his owne house, as his lawfull wife: not being so well pleased to have parte, as he was force and angrie also to let an other enjoy her. Now Poppea her selfe (as it is reported) did not mislike this his gealouzie, for sometimes the woulde shut her dore against Nero, though Otho were not within: either bicaufe the woulde keepe Nero in breath, and in loue liking still, or elfe as fome thought, bicause the would not have Cesar to her husbande, and likewise that the would not refuse him for her frend, bicause the was wantonly genen. But so it is, Otho was in daunger of his life by marying of Poppea: and fo was it also a straunge thing, that Nero hauing put his wife and lifter to death, only to mary Poppea, he did yet pardon Otho, and faued his E life. Howebeit it was for Senecaes fake that was his frende, through whose perswasion he was fent to the furthest parte of Spayne alongest the Ocean sea, to be Gouernour of Lysita-NIA. And there he gouerned to wifely that he was nothing chargeable nor trouble tome vnto the contry knowing that this honorable charge was genen him, only to mitigate and hide his banishent. Afterwards when Galba had rebelled, he was the first of all the Gouernours of the prounces that joyned with him, and bringing with him all his plate, both golde and filuer, vnto the mynt maister, he gaue it him to put into bullion, and so to be converted into current coyne. Moreouer he gaue of his officers vnto Galba, those which he thought the meetest men to ferue a Prince: and otherwife, when he was tried, he shewed him selfe as faithfull and skilfull in matters of state, as any one that followed the Emperours traine. Infomuch as all the way he went many dayes iorney in coch with Galba him felfe, and did maruelouslie currie fauour with Titus Iunius, bestowing great gifts vpon him, and also enterteining him with pleaA fant species but specially, bicause he willingly gaue him the upper had wherby he was affured to bettle fecod person in credit about Galba. Now this in fight, femed chiefly to be done to honor the Emperor with references B though in deede it was a fine deuise to ouerthrow him, to bribe the fouldiers in that fort as he did:So Galba cofulting whom he should make his successor: T. Junius presured Otho vnto hims the which he did not simply of himselfe, nor without reward, but only with promise that Othe should marry his daughter if Galba did adopt him his sonne, & proclaime him successor in the Empire Mowbeit Galba did alway specially regard the comon wealth before his printat liking.

& fought to adopt fuch a one, as should not so much please himself, as otherwise he should be proffitable & meete for the Empire. But furely in my opinion, Galba would not make Othe his heire of his goods, colidering what an vnreasonable speder he was, & how sumptuous in al his things, & besides, sargone in det: for he ought aboue fine thowsand Myriades. So when he had heard finan coulell about this adoptione getly without other answer, did put oner his deterc minario vatil another time, & made Otho only Coful at that time, & T. Junius Coful with himi whereby it was straight supposed, that at the beginning of the new yere, he would proclaime him his fucceffor in the Empire. Which was the thing the fouldiers molt defired of all other, But now delaying ftil his determination, the legions of the ROMANES in GERMANY, did rife & The legions rebel against him al at an instant. For he was generally hated of al his fouldiers, bicause he paid in Germanie the not the gift he had promifed them. So they particularly to cloke their malicious intent, alguing Galba, leaged for their cause of rising, that he had dishonorably rejected Verginins Rusus and that the GAV LES which had fought against the, were rewarded with great & rich priniledges, & they that tooke not part with Vindex, had bene grieuously punished & putto death. Moreouer, that Galba did only honor Vindex death after he was dead, as acknowledging his goodwil vinto him. 1) offring publike oblatios & funeral facrifices for him, as if by him only he had bene proclaimed Emperor. Now fuch speches & rumors ran through the cape amogst the, whe the first day of the yere came, which the Romanes cal the calends of Ianuary, on which day whe Flaceus had called the fouldiers together, to sweare them to the Emperor according to the custome: they plucked down Galbaes images, & sware only in the name of the people, & the Senate of Rome, The soldier The captaines seing what course they tooke, were as much affraid of the dauger to be without decrebell aa head, as they stood doutful of the mischief of their rebellio. So there stept vp one amogst the sainst Gallan

These newes runing straight through F his cape, Fabius Vales, colonel of a legio, came the next morning with a great nuber of horseme, & was the first ma that named Vitellius Emperor, who before semed to refuse that name, as one that was affraid to take the charge of so great an Empire vpon him: but after dinner, being full

So Gulba hearing of this new chauge, thought it not good to deferre time any leger for the adoption he had intended wherfore certainly understanding that those whom he trusted most about him, were parties in this matter, some taking part with Dolabella, & the most part of the with Osbo, he neither liking the one nor the other lodginly without any word spoke to any man, he sent for Pila (that was the youger sonne of Crassus & Piso, whom Nero had put to death) a youg man faier conditioned & thewed by his grave & modest countenance he had by nature, shathe was indued with many B noble vertues. Galba came downe presently fro his pallace, & went straight to the cape to ptoclaime Pifo Cafar, & his fuccessor in the Empire. Howbeit at his fetting out of his pallace, there appeared many great fignes in the firmamet which followed him. And moreover, whehe was also come into his cape, & that he began to say without booke part of his oratio. & partly also to read it:it lightned al the while he ipake, & there fel fuch a great shower of raine vpon it. & 2 maruelous thickmist in the cape, & ouer al the city, that me might easely se the gods did not like this adoptio, & that it would not prosper. The souldiers the selwed their discotentment by their heavy looks, & the rather, bicause at that time there was no speech of reward or liberality. And furthermore, they that were present also, maruelled much (for that they could gather by the contenance & words of Pifo) that Pifo nothing reioiced at this great favor, although he C lacked not wit & understanding otherwise to acknowledge it. And on the other side also they found eafely by Othors lookes, many fignes & proofes that he was marueloufly offended in his mind to fee that he was thus deceived of his hope. For he being the ma that was first spoke of, & thought most worthiest of all other, & being comen also so necessate it now to see himselse thus wiped out of it, he supposed that it was a plaine proofe that Galba had no good opinion of him, & that he maliced him in his hart, so that after that time he still stood in seare of his life. For he being affraid of Pifo, hating also Galba, & being grieuously offended with T. Innius: he wet his way ful of divers thoughts in his mind. For the Soothfaiers, Astronomers, & Chaldeans which he euer kept about him, they did perswade him not to be discoraged for this, & to cast all hope aside: but specially one Ptolomy, in whom he had great condence, bicause he had oftenmes before foretold and affured him, that Nero thould not put him to death, but contrarily, that Nero should die first, & he himself survive him, & should become Emperor of Rome. Wherby Ptolony having proved his first prediction true vnto him, he bad him be bold, & feare not that to come. But now befides him, those that secretly coplained vnto him, did prick him forward the more fighing to fee him fo euil delt with by Galba, & divers of the chiefly, which bare great authority & credit about Tigellinus & Nymphidius: who being the cast of, & discoutenaced came all vnto him, & stirred him vp the more. As amongst others, Veturius & Barbius chiefly, of the which the one had bene Optio, and the other Tefferarius: (for fo the Romane's call those that be their meffengers, (pials, & officers to the Captaines) who with an infranchifed bondman of his called Onomastus, went vnto the campe, and there corrupted some souldiers with ready mo- E ney, & other fome with faire words, being of them selues evil inclined, & expected but occafion to ytter their malice. For otherwise, had the souldiers bene all of one mind, it had not bene an enterprise to have bene brought to passe in source dayes space (being no more between the adoption and murther) to make a whole campe rebell in that forte. For they were flaine the fifteenth day of Ianuarie, on which day Galba did facrifice in the morning within his pallace, before his frends. But at that time the Soothfaier called Ombricius, when he had the intralls of the beafts facrificed in his hands, & had looked vpon them: he spake not doutfully, but plainly, that he faw fignes of great tumult and rebellion, and that the Emperour was in present daunger of great treason. Whereby it plainly appeared, that the goddes had put Galba into Othoes Affed against hands: for he stood at that time behind Galba, & both heard & saw all that the Soothsayer did. 1 So he feeming to be griened withall in his minde, and his colour chaunging oft for the feare he was in: his infranchifed bondeman Onomastus came and tolde him that the masons and chiefe

A chiefe carpinters were come to speake with him, and taried for him. This was the watch word agreed vppon betwene them, at which tyme Otho shoulde then goe vnto the souldiers. Then Otho favd, that he went to looke to an olde house he had bought, which was falling downe, and in decay, and that he would shewe it vnto the workemen. So he went his way, and came from the pallace, by the place they call Tiberius house, into the market place, where the golden piller standeth, where also the greatest high wayes of all ITALIE doe meete together. There certaine met him that first called him Emperour, which were not in all aboue three with called & twentie persons. Thereupon, though Otho was not vnconstant as it appeared, notwithstan- Emperson. ding he was so fine and effeminate a man, but rather resolute and stout in instant daunger: yet feare so oppressed him at that time, that he would faine have left his enterprise. Howbeit the B fouldiers would not fuffer him, but compaffing his litter rounde about with their armes, and their swords drawne in their hands, they commanded the litter men to go forward. So Otho as he went hastening on his drivers, he often muttered to him selfe, I am but dead. Some hearing him as they passed by him, rather wondred, then that they were otherwise troubled, to see fuch a small nuber of men about him, that they durst venter voon so hard an enterprise. Now as he was caried through the market place, he was met withall by certaine others, and afterwards by others, by three & by foure in a company: all the which came and joyned with him, & cried Cafar, Cafar, having their fwords drawen in their hands. Now the Colonell appointed for that day to gard the field of Mars, knew nothing of this conspiracy, but being amazed and affraied with their fodaine comming, he fuffred them to come in. So when Otho was come in, Othoreceined C he found no man that refifted him. For they that knew nothing of the practife, being compaf- of the Pratefed in with those that were made priny to it,& had knowen it of long time:being found stragling here and there, by one & by two, they followed the rest for feare at the first, & afterwards for good wil. This was brought straight to Galba to the pallace, the Soothsayer being yet busie of people from the market place, vnto the pallace. Therupon Iunius & Lacon, & certaine other of Galbaes infranchifed bondmen, stoode to gard Galbaes person with their swordes drawen in their hads. Pife also went out to speake vnto the souldiers that garded the Emperours person. Moreouer, bicause the ILLYRIAN legion lay out of the campe in a place called Vipsanus: they D dispatched away Marius Celsus with all spede, a very honest man, to get that place. Galba in the meane time stood in dout whether he should come out of the pallace or not: for Iunius would not let him goe, but Celfus and Lacon perswaded him to go out. Insomuch as they fell at great words with Iunius, that went about to diffwade him from it. In this flurre, there ranne a rumor that Otho was flaine in the field. Immediatly after came Inbins Attions, one of the noblest foul-Afternoon diers of all the Emperours gard, & shewed his sword drawen, crying that he had slaine Cafars be of a foulenemie: and thrust through the prease, and got to Galba, and shewed him his sword bloodied. dur.

Galba looking him in the face, asked him who commaunded him to doe it. The fouldier aunfivered him: the faith & othe he had made vnto him. Therewith all the people that stoode by cried out it was nobly done of him, & clapped their handes for ioy. Then Galba taking his lit-E ter, went out of his pallace to do facrifice to Iupiter, and also to shew him selfe openly. Howbeit he was no foner come into the market place, but he heard contrarie newes, that Othowas Lord and Maister of the whole campe, and armie. with their fwords drawen in their hands, and neuer a man of his left with him to offer to de- A fende him, fauing one man onely, whom the Sunne fawe that day, amongest so many thowfands of men, worthy of the Empire of Rome: and he was called * Sempronius. He having receiued privately no manner of pleasure at Galbaes handes, but only to discharge his othe and ductie: stepped before the litter, and lifting vp a vine braunche he had in his hand (with the which the ROMANE Captaines doe vie to beate their fouldiers that have offended) he fell out with them that did fet vpon him, and prayed them to holde their hands, and not to hurt their Emperour. But in the ende when he faw they would not leave, but that they fell to it in good earnest: he then drew his sword, and bare of the blowes as well as he could, vntil they hought him, that he fell to the ground. Then Galbaes litter being overthrowen right in the place called Curtius lake: Galba lay on the ground armed in his curaces. The traiterous fouldiers flew R vppon him, and gaue him many a wounde: and Galba holding out his necke vnto them, bad them strike hardily, if it were to do their contrie good. So he had many wounds on his armes and his thighes, as it is reported: howebeit the fouldier that flue him, was called Camurius. of the fifteenth legion. Others doe reporte that it was one Terentius, other also say Arcadius: And some other doe call him Fabius Fabulus: who having striken of his head, wrapped it in the lappe of his gowne, bicause he coulde not otherwise take holde of it, for that he was all balde. Howebeit his fellowes and confortes woulde not fuffer him to hide it, but rather that his notable fact he had done thould be seene. Therefore he set it vpon the point of his launce, and so shaking the face of this poore olde man, (a wife and temperate Prince, and chiefe Bishoppe, and Confull) he ranne vp and downe (like madde women possessed with the spirite C and furie of Bacchus at the feastes of Bacchus) bowing downe his launce being all of a goare blood. When his head was brought to Otho, it is fayd he cried out alowd: tush, my fellowes. this is nothing: vnleffe you bring me also Pifees head. So not long after, they brought him his head also. For the young man being hurt, fled, and was followed by one called * Marcus, who flue him hard by the temple of Veffa. So did they also kill Titus Iunius: who openly confessed that he was one of the conspiracie against Galba, and cried out to them that slue him, that Othe did not know they did kill him. This notwithstanding, the souldiers strake of his head, and Lacons also, and brought them both to Otho to receive the reward. Howbeit, as the Poet Ar-but Vitellius notwithstanding made inquirie of them afterwardes, and caused them to be put to death. There came into the fielde also, one Marius Celsus, whome divers men accused to haue persivaded the souldiers to aide Galba, and the common people cried out, and bad he shoulde be put to death. Howebeit Otho woulde not suffer them to kill him: and vet being affrayed to contrarie the fouldiers mindes, he tolde them they should not kill him fo rashly, bicause he was first to learne some thinges more of him. So he commaunded them to binde him, and deliuered him to be kept of those he trusted most. Afterwards, the Senate were pre- E fentlie affembled: who, as if men had bene fodainlie chaunged from them they were, or as if there had bene new goddes, they all sware by the name of Otho, (the which othe he him selfe had before sworne vnto Galba, and did not keepe it) and called him besides, Augustus, and Ca-(4r, the bodies of them that were flainelying yet headles on the ground in the market place, all in their Confulls robes. And as for their heades, the fouldiers after they coulde tell no more what to doe with them, they folde the heade of Titus Iunius vnto his daughter, for the fumme of two thowsande fine hundred Drachmas. And for Pifoes head, his wife through intreatie, begged it of one called Veranius. On the other fide, for Galbaes head, they gaue it vnto Patrobius and Vitellius fernauntes: who, after they had vied it as vilelie as they coulde deuise, they threwe it at length in a place, where their bodies are cast, whome the Casars put to B death, the which they call Sestertium. Nowe for his bodie, Heluidius Priseus, through Othoes fufferance, caried it away, and Argins, one of his infranchifed bondemen, buried it by night.

A Thus have you heard the historie of Galba, a man that in nobilitie and wealth was inferiour to few ROMANES, and in them both was the chiefest man of all his time, and had alway lived in honorable fame and estimacion, in the raigne of fine Emperours. So that he ouercame Nero by his good name, and the good opinion men had of him: and not through his owne force and power. For of them that strong to make them selues Emperours at that time some sound no man that thought them worthie of it: others did put foorth them felues, as thinking them felues worthie of it. Howbeit Galba was called vnto it, and obeyed them that called him, vfing his name against Vindex boldnesse: whereby he procured, that his rising (which before was called innovation and rebellion) was then called civill warre, after that his faction, came to haue a man to be their head thought worthy to be their Emperour. And therefore he did not B fo muche defire to be Emperour for him felfe, as to doe good to his contrie and common wealth. But yet he erred, in feeking to commaunde the fouldiers whom Tigellinus and Nimphidius had spoyled by their flatteries : earen as in olde time Scipio, Fabricius, and Camillus did commaund the fouldiers of the Empire of Rome at that time. So he being now a verteolde man, shewed him selfe a good Emperour and after the old forte, in his behauior towardes the fouldiers only: but in all other things elfe, being caried away with the couetoufnes of T. Inmius and Laco, and of other his infranchifed bondmen, he left none defirous to be governed by him, but many that were forie for his death

Capitoll, and factificed, and there fent for Marsus Celfus to come vn- ration at the to him, whom he curt coussie saluted, and prayed hun rather to forget by raight the cause of his imprisonment, then to remember his deliverie. Marius Celsus made him a wise and noble aunswere againe, and sayd that the matter for the which they would have accused him vnto him, did witnes his behauiour, shewing him selfe faithfull vitto Galba, who neuer did him any pleafure. Thele words of them both did marnelouflie also establish them Consuls in their place and degree, which had bene called vnto that dignitie by Nero, or otherwise by Galba: and he also honored the oldest Senators and of greatest estimacion with certaine Priesthoodes. Besides all this, he restored vuto all those Senators that were banished by Nero, and called home againe, all their goodes yet vnfold. Whereupon the chiefest Magistrats and noble men of the citie that quaked before for seare, supposing that he was not a man, but rather a deuill or furie of hell that was come to be Emperour : they all became glad men, for the good hope of this finiling and gracious raighe they were so lately entred into. Moreover, nothing pleased all the Romanes together more, nor wanne him the good will of all men formuche, as that he did vnto Tigellinus. For it was punishment enough for him, if he had had no more but the feare of the punishment enerie man threatned him B withall, as a thing due to the common wealth, and also by reason of the incurable diseases his hodic was infected withall. Now, though the noble men thought his ynreasonable infolency and luft of the flesh, (following naughtie packes, and common strumpets, burning still in filthie concupifcence) an extreame punishment, comparable to many deaths, and being also no better then a dead man in maner, still following pleasure and sensualitie as long as he coulde: this notwithstanding, all men were offended with him, that they shoulde see suche a wicked creature as he live, that had put so many noble men to death. So Otho sent for him, who lived verie pleasauntlie at his houses in the contrie, by the citie of Sinvessa, and had shippes euer readie vppon the sea coast, to sie if necessitie draue him to it. Thereuppon he first sought to bribe him with money, which was fent with commission to apprehend him, and perswaded G him to let him scape: but when he saw he could not frame him to his minde, yet he refrayned not to geue him gifts, and prayed him to geue him leaue to shaue his beard. The other graunted him. Then Tigellinus tooke a razer, and did cut his owne throte. So, Otho having pleased the people thus well, he fought not otherwise to be revenged of his private injuries. Moreouer, to currie fauour with the common people, he refuled not to be called Nero, in any open affemblies at the Theaters. Also when certaine private men had set vp Neroes images in open fight, Otho was not offended withall : but moreouer Clodius Rufus writeth, that letters pattents & comissions were fent into Spayne by posts, subscribing the goodly name of Nero, with the beginning of name of Otho. How beit when it came to his eares that the noble men of Rome misliked of it: he left it of, and would wryte it no more in his letters. So Otho having begonne in this forte D him the name to stablish his Empire, the fouldiers maruelouslie troubled him. For they continually perswaded him to take heede to him felfe, and to beware how noblemen and gentlemen came neere vnto him: the which they did, either for that in deede they bearing him good will, were affrayed some trecherie or treason would be secretlie practised against him: or else it was some fained deuise to set all together by the eares, and to bring it to civill warre. For when Otho him felfe had fent Cribinus with his feuenteenth legion to bring him certaine prisoners, and that Crispinus was ready before day, going to performe the effect of his commission, having loden carts with armor and weapon for his fouldiers: the desperatest and boldest men among them, began to crie out, and fayd that Crispinus ment no good in his hart, and that the Senate went about to make some chaunge and sturre, and that his armor and weapons were not for Casar, E but against him. These wordes moued many mens consciences, and made them to rebell: so that some layed hold upon the cares to stay them, others slue two Centurions out of hande,

The death of and Crispinus him selfe also that woulde have stayed them. Thereuppon all of them together, one incoraging an other, went directly to Rome, as meaning to aide the Emperour. But when they came thither, understanding that there were foure score Senators at supper with the Emperour, they ranne straight to the pallace, crying out that it was a good occasion offered them to kill all Cafars enemies at a clappe. Hercupon all Rome was straight in armes, looking immediatly after to be facked and spoyled of all that euer they had: and the people ranne vp and downe the pallace, here and there, Otho him felfe also being in great feare and distresse. For men might easelie see he was affrayed, bicause of his ghestes he had bidden, not for him n felfe, feeing them all amazed with the matter for feare, not speaking a word vnto him, but staring on him still, and speciallie those that came and brought their wines with them to supper.

A So Otho fodainly fent the Captaines vnto the fouldiers & commaunded them to speake with them, & to pacifie them as well as they could: and therewithall he made them take away the borde, and conveyed his ghestes out of his pallace by secret posternes. So they saved them felues, passing through the fouldiers, a litle before they entred into the hall where the feast was kept, crying out, and asking, what was become of Cafars enemies. So the Emperour rifing from his bedde, he pacified them with gentle wordes, the teares standing in his eyes, and thereby at length he fent them all away. The next morning he liberallie bestowed ypon energy Othors liber fouldier, a thousande two hundred and fiftie Drachmas: and then he went into the market fouldiers, places & there gaue great commendation to the common people for their readie good wills they had shewed vinto him howbeit, he said there were some among them, that vinder colour

B and pretext of honestie, did commit many lewde partes, and made his goodnesse and grace towards them to be euill spoken of, and their constancie and faith also to be misliked of, and prayed them his griefe might be theirs, and that the offendors might be punished. They all confirmed his words, and bad him alowde he should doe it. So Othe thereuppon caused two of them only to be apprehended, supposing no man would be greatlie offended with the punishment of them, and then went his way. Those that loued and trusted him, marueled much to fee this chaunge. Other were of opinion, that it stoode him you to doe so, to winne the fouldiers harts, bicause of the warre at hand. Now newes came flying to him out of all partes, that Vitellius had taken upon him the authoritie to be Emperour, and posts came to him one Vitelliurre. in an others necke, to tel him that numbers of people came in daily to lubmit them felues vn-bellion. C to Vitellius. Others tolde him also, how the legions remayning in PANONIA, DALMATIA, and

Mysia, had chosen Otho. Immediatly after, frendly letters were brought him also from Mytianus and Velhalianus, the one of them being in Syria, and the other in Ivdea, with great and mightie armies. Whereuppon Otho geuing credit vnto them, wrote vnto Vitellius, and bad him beware how he meddled with any deeper enterprise, then became a private souldier: and that he would geue him golde and filuer enough, and a great citie, where he might liue quietly, and take his pleasure. Vitellius gently aunswered him at the first, and sported with him: but afterwards they falling out one with an other, spiteful letters were sent betweet either parties, one of them reproaching an other, not falfely but fondly, and foolishly detecting eche others vices. For in deede it was hard to judge, which of them two was most licentiously genen, most small diffe-D effeminate, least skilfull, poorer, or most indetted before. Nowe at that time they talked of other and the wonderful fignes that had bene fene: how beit they were but flying tales, & there was no man rellium ma to iustifie them. But in the Capitoll there was the image of Victorie set vppon a triumphing winders chariot: the which euery bodie faw did let flacke the reynes of the bridles of the horses which feene as the had in her handes, as though the could not flay them any more. The flatue of Caius Cafar Reme.

also within the Iland, which standeth in the middest of the river of Tiber at Rome, without any earthquake or storme of winde, turned of it selfe from the West to the East: the which (as it is reported) chanced about the time that Velpasian began to take vpon him to be Emperour. Many also tooke the ouerflowing of the river of Tiber for an euil figne. For in deede it was at The wonderthat time of the yeare when rivers do swell most, yet was it never so great before, neither had full overflow-E it euer done so much hurt as it did at that time. For it had ouerstowen her bankes, and drow- ur of Tiber. ned the most parte of the citie, and specially the corne market: insomuche that they suffered famine many dayes after in ROME. In all this sturre, newes came that Cecinna and Valens, (two of Vitellius Captaines) had taken the mountaines of the Alpes: and moreouer in Rome, Dolabella a noble man, was suspected by the Prætorian souldiers, that he practised some treason. Now Otho, either bicause he was affrayed of him, or of some other: he sent him to the citie of AQVINVM, promifing him he shoulde have no other hurte. Then choosing the choyces gentlemen which he would take with him, among others he tooke Lucius, the brother of Vitellius, and did not depriue him of any jot of his honor and dignitie. Moreover, he was verie carefull to fee his wife and mother safe, that they shoulde not be affrayed of them sclues. Be-F sides all this, he appointed Flauius Sabinus, Vespasians brother, Gouernour of Rome in his ab-fence: and did it for Neroes fake, who had affore geuen him the fame honor and authoritie the which Galba had taken from him: or els to make Vespasian see, that he loued & trusted him.

noble and great personages, how beit they could not have their wills to rule the armie as they woulde, bicause of the infolencie and stubbornes of the souldiers, who would have no other The from and. Captaines but the Emperour only, faying that he, and none other, should commaund them. In deede, the enemies fouldiers also were not muche wifer, nor more obedient to their Cantaines, but were braue and lustic youn the selfe fame occasion; howbeit they had this aduantage ouer the other, that they could tell how to fight, and were all well trained in the warres. and could away with paines and hardnes, and neuer thronke from it. Whereas the Prætorian fouldiers that came from Rome, were fine mealed mouthed men, bicause they had bene long from the warres, & had lived at case in Rome, and taken their pleasure in banketing & playes: R and therefore in a brauery and jolity, they would needes have men thinke that they discained to do what their Captaines commaunded them, as men that were too good to do it, and not that they were fine fingered, and loth to take paines. So that when Spuring would have compelled them, he was in daunger of death, and icaped verie narowly that they flue him not. For they stucke not to reuile him, and geue him as fowle words as they could: calling him traitor. and curfing him, faving that he marred all Cafars affaires. Yea and there were some of them that having their full cuppes went in the night to his tent, to aske him leave to depart, faving that they would go to the Emperour, and complaine to him of him. But the flowte they had Placetian the genen them by their enemies about that time, hard by the city of Placentia, did stand Some rina and his affaires to great purpole. For Vitellius fouldiers comming hard to the walls of the C citie did mocke Othoes men that were at the cranewes of the fame, and called them fine daynfers, and goodly stage players, that had seene nothing but playes and feasts; and that for feats of armes, and battells, they knewe not what it ment: and that the greatest act they ever did, was for that they strake of the head of a poore naked olde man, meaning by Galba: and that to come to fight a battell in the fielde before men, their hartes were in their heeles. These vile words galled them to the hart, and made them fo mad withall, that they came of them felues to pray Spuring to commaund them what he thought good promifing that from thence forth they would never refuse any paines or daunger he would put them to. Thereupon, there was a hotte affault geuen to the city of PLACENTIA, with greatstore of fundry engines. Howbeit Spuringes men had the better, and having with great slaughter repulsed the assailants, they sa- D ued one of the goodlieft, the greatest, and most florishing cities of all ITALIE. So Othoes Captaines were farre more familiar, curteous, and civill to deale with cities and private men. The praise of then Vitellius souldiers were. For, of Vitellius Captaines, Cecinna, was neither for personnor maners accompanyable for the people, but straunge, monstruous, & troublesome to see him only, a mightie made man wearing gallie gaskons, and coates with fleeues, after the facion of Fuelin Cap. the GAVLES, and spake in this attire vnto the ensigne bearers, and Captaines of the Ro-MANES. Furthermore, he had his wife alway with him brauely mounted a horsebacke, gallantlie apparelled, and accompanied with a troupe of the choycest men of armes of all the companies. The other, Fabius Valens, he was fo couctous, that no spovle of enemies, no polling of subjects, nor bribes taken of their frends and confederats, could quenche or fatisfie his R vn[atiable couetousnes: whereby it seemeth that was the let, that comming on so slowly, he was not at the first battell. Howbeit others do blame Cecinna for it, that made too much hast, for the defire he had to have the only honor of the victory to him felfe: & this was the cause. that besides his other light faultes, he also made this, that he gaue battell out of due time and feafon, and when it came to the povist in deede, yet he fought it not out valliantly, fo that he had almost cast all away. For when he had the repulse from Placentia, he went vnto Cre-MONA an other great citie. And Annius Gallus going to aide Spurina, who was belieged in the citie of PLACENTIA: when he heard by the way that the PLACENTINES had the better, and that the CREMONENSES were in great daunger and diffresse: he marched thither with his arfeafting and banketing, neuer feeling the discommodities and bitter paines of warre, and did a Rome, fee my, and went and camped hard by the enemies. After that also, the other Captaines of either p fide came to aide their men. Howbeit Cecinna having layed a great number of his best souldiers well armed in ambushe, in certaine thicke groues and woddes: he commaunded his 1124 A horsemen to march forward, and if the enemies came to charge them, that they should retyre litle and litle, making as though they fled, vntill they had drawen them within his ambush, So there were certaine traitors that bewrayed the ambush vnto Marius Celsus, who came against them with his choyce men of armes, and did not followe them ouerrafhly, but compaffed in the place where the ambush lay, the which he raised, and in the meane time sent to his campe with all possible speede to his footemen to make hast thitherward: and it seemeth, that if they had comen in time, they had not left one of their enemies aliue, but had marched vpon the bellies of all Cecinnaes armie, if they had followed the horsemen in time, as they should have done. But Paulinus being comen too late to aide them, for that he came fo flowly: he was burdened that he did not the duetie of a Captaine, that bare the name and countenaunce heca-

B ried. Furthermore, the common fouldiers accused him of treason vnto Otho. and stirred vp Pesilina, 0. their Emperour against him, and spake verie bigge words of them selues, saying, that they had their cap. ouercomen for their owne partes, had not the cowardlines of their Captaines bene, who put for a count them by the victory. So Otho did not trust him fo much, that he would not make him belove but that he mistrusted somwhat. Therefore he sent his brother Titianus to the campe, and Proelus with him, Captaine of the Prætorian garde, who in deede commaunded all, but in fight Titianus had all the honor, as bearing the name of the Emperours Lieutenaunt, Marius Celfue, and Paulinus followed after, bearing name of counfellers and frends only: howbeit otherwise they meddled with nothing, neither had any authoritie geuen them. On the other fide. the enemies were in as much trouble as they, and those specially, whom Valens led. For when C newes was brought of the conflict that was between them in this ambushe, they were angrie with him, bicause they were not at it, and for that he had not led them thither, to helpe their men that were flaine: infomuch that he had much a doe to pacifie and quiet them, they were so readie to haue flowen vpon him. So Valens at length remoued his campe. & went & joyned with Cecinna. Howbeit Otho being comen to his campe at the towne of BEBRIACVM, which Bebriacema is a litle towne hard by CREMONA: he confulted with his Captaines whether he should gene towne by Crebattell or not. So Proclus and Titianus gaue him counsell to fight, considering that the souldiers were verie willing to it, by reason of the late victorie they had wonne, and wished him others connotto deferreit: for thereby he shoulde but discorage his armie, which was now willing to sulling t fight, and also geue their enemies leasure to tarie for their Chiefetaine Vitellius, who came int.

D him selfe out of GAVLE. But Paulinus in contrarie manner alleaged, that the enemies had all their force and power present, with the which they thought to fight with them, and also to ouercome them, and that they wanted nothing : whereas Otho looked for an other atmic out of Mysia and Pannonia, as great an armie as his enemies had alreadie, to that he could tary his time, & not ferue his enemies turne : and alfo, that if the fouldiers being now but a few in number were willing to fight, they should then be much more incoraged, when they should haue greater companie, and should also fight with better safetie. Furthermore he perswaded them, that to delay time was for their auaile, confidering that they had plentie and store of all maner of prouision: where the enemies on thother side being also in their enemies contrie. their vittells would quickely faile them. Marius Celfus liked verie well of these perswasions,

E And fo did Annius Gallus, who was not present at this counsell (but gone from the campe, to be cured of a fall he had from his horse) but he was wrytten to by Otho to haue his opinion alfo. So Annius Gallus returned aunswere, that he thought it not best to make hast, but to stay for the armie that came out of Mysta, considering they were onwardes on their way. Howbeit Otho woulde not hearken to this counfell, but followed their mindes that concluded of battell: for the which were alleaged divers occasions. But the chiefest and likeliest cause of all was, that the fouldiers which are called the Prætorian gard (being the dayly gard about the Preference Emperours person) finding then in effect what it was to professe to be a souldier, and to line souldiers to like a fouldier: they lamented their continuing in Rous, where they lived at case & pleasure; present life to come, neither could any lenger abide the grieuous thoughts of the daunger of his estate, A he was so effeminate, and vnacquainted with sorowe, and paines. This was the cause that caried him on headlong, as a man that shutteth his eyes falling from a high place, and so to put Secundus the all at aduenture. The matter is thus reported by Secundus the Orator, and Othoes secretarie. Orater, serre. Others also doe report, that both armies had divers determinations and mindes: as to ioyne the the Empe- all together in one campe, and joyntly to choose among them, if they could agree, the worthiest man of all the Captaines that were there: if not, then to assemble the whole Senate in a place together, & there to fuffer the Senators to choose such a one Emperour, as they liked best of. And sure it is verie likely it was so, considering that neither of them both which were then called Emperours, was thought meete for the place they had; and therefore that these counsells and consideracions might easely fall into the Romane souldiers header (who were R wife men and expert fouldiers) that in deede it was a thing for them justly to mislike, to bring them selves into the like miserable time and calamitie, which their predecessors before them had caused one an other to suffer, first for Sylla and Marius sakes, and afterwards for Casar and Pompey, and now to bestow the Empire of Rome either vpon Vitellius, to make him the abler to follow his dronkennes and gluttony: or elfe ypon Otho, to maintaine his wanton and licentious life. This was the cause that moved Celsus to delay time, hoping to end the warres withton and licen- out trouble and daunger: and that caused Otho also to make the more hast, being affrayed of the same. Howebeit Otho returning backe agains to BRESSELLES, he committed an other fault, not only bicause he tooke his mens good wils from the to fight, the which his presence. and the reuerence they bare vnto him did put in them: but bicause also he caried away with C. him for the gard of his person the valliantest souldiers & most resolute men of all his host. About that time there chaunced a skirmish to fall out by the river of Po, bicause Cecinna built a bridge ouer it, & Othoes men did what they could to hinder them. Howbeit when they faw they prenailed not, they laded certaine barges with faggots and drie wodde, all rubbed ouer with brimstone and pitche, and setting them a fire, they sent them downe the streame. When the barges were in the middest of the streame, there sodainlie rose a winde out of the river, which blewe uppon this worddestake they had prepared to cast among the enemies workes of this bridge, that first made it smoke, and immediatly after fell all on a great flame, which did fo trouble the men in the barges, that they were driven to leape into the river to fave them felues: and to they loft their barges, and became them felues also prisoners to their enemies. D to their great shame and mockerie. Furthermore, the GERMAINES under Vitellius, fighting with Others fenfers, which of them should winne a little Hand in the middest of the river : they had the upper hand, and flue many of the fenfers. Thereuppon Othars fouldiers which were in BERRIAC VM, being in a rage withall, and would nedes fight: Proclas brought them into the fielde, and went and camped about fiftie furlong out of the citie, to fondly, and to fo litle purpole, that being the spring of the yeare, and all the contrie thereabout full of brookes and riuers, yet they notwithstanding lacked water. The next morning they raised their campe to meete with their enemies the fame day, and were driven to march above a hundred furlong. Now, Paulinus perswaded them to go sayer and softly, and not to make more hast then neded. and would not fo foone as they should come; (being wearied with their iorney and trauell) fet H vpon their enemies that were well armed, and besides had leasure & time enough to set their men in battell ray, whileft they were coming to long a torney with all their cariage. Now the Captaines being of divers opinions about this matter, there came a horseman from Otho, one of those they call the Nomades, that brought them letters, in the which Otho commaunded them to make all the haft they could, and to loofe no time, but to marche with all speede towards the enemie. So when these letters were reduce Captaines presently marched forward with their armie. Cecimia understanding of their comming, was astonied at the first, and sodainlie forfooke the worke of his bridge to returne to his campe, where he founde the most parte of his fouldiers alreadie armed, and Valens had genen them their fignall & word of battell. And in the meane time, whileft the legions were taking their places to fet them felues in p battell ray: they sent out before the choycest horsemen they had, to skirmish. Now there ran a rumor (no man knew how, nor vpon what cause) that Fitellius Captaines would turne on

F therefore fo earnestly crie out to fight, that there was no staying of them, as if they should at ting the their first crie and setting forward, haue ouerthrowen their enemies. Moreouer, it seemed alfo that Otho him felfe could no more away with the feare and dour of the vncertaine fucceffe fouldin.

A Othors fide in battoll. Infomuch that when these men of armes cameneare to meete with the soward of Othors armie: Othors men did speake very gently to them, and called them company mons Fivellius men on the other fide tooke this falutacionin suill parte, and aunswered them againe in tage as men that were willing to fight. Infomuch that those that had spoke to them, were duite differriged; and the relidue also beganne to suspect their companions which had spoken to the in and millrusked them to be traytors. And this was the chiefest cause of all their cutorder, being quity to insine battell. Furthermore, on the enemies fide alfo, all was out of ordes sforthe beafts of cariage ranne in amongest them that fought, and so did put them marneloully out of of der: Befides that also, the disaduauntage of the place where they fought, did compell them to disperse one from another, bicause of fundry ditches and trenches that were B betweine them, whereby they were compelled to fight in divers companies together. So there Band bewere bur two legions onely, the one of Witellius, called the denowrer: and the other of Otho, mist the Os called the seepercwhich getting out of these holes and ditches a part by them selves, in a good Vitellian. plaine even ground, fought it out fo a long time together in good order of battel. So when they came to joyne, Othors men gaue fuch a lufty charge vpon the first onset, that they ouerthrew, & flue all the first rancke, and also wanne the enseigne of the eagle, Vitellius men were to ashamed of it, and therewith in such a rage, that they tooke hart against (C) vitto them, and ranne in fo desperately upon their enemies, that at the first they slue the colonell of all their legion, and wanne divers enfignes. This notwithstanding, there were men in based a great number of Othoes men who having overthrowen the voward of them that made head by the Vielagainst them, they forced a lane through their enemies that were Conquerors, and so valliantly returned back into their campe, But of their Captaines, nether Proclus, nor Paulinus, durft lines of the returne backe with them, but fled another way, being affraid of the furye of the fouldiers, that following they would lay all the fault of their ouerthrow vpon their Captaines. Howbeit Annius Gallus received them into the citie of BEBRIAC VM, that came together after this overthrow, & told them that the battell was equall betwixt them, and that in many places they had had the better of their enemies. But Marius Celsus gathering the noble men and gentlemen together that had charge in the army, he fell to consultacion what they should do in so great a calamitie, & E extreamessaughter of the Romane Citizens. Cecima vnderstanding what the matter was, roadenbither and pacified the tues mult of these men of armes: and then saluting Cellin very currequity, he want with him towardes Brenzacym. But nowe Titianus in the meane time be reprotinge him felic that he had fent Ambassadors vnto the enemies, he placed the desperatest souldiers be had abon the walls of the citie, and incoraged the rest also to doe the like, and to stand to the defense. But H Cecinna came to the wal, & being a horsebacke, held up his hand wito them. Then they made no more relistance, but those that were your the walles, saluted the souldiers cand they that were within the citie opened the gates, and thrust in amongest Vitellius menombones evaed them, and did no man any hurt, but curteoully imbraced them, and faluted eche other. Then they all fware and tooke their othes to be true to Fitelline, and fovelded themilelus vnto him. So doe the most part of those that were at this battell, report the successe thereof graunting notwithstanding that they knew not enery thing that was done, bicause of the great disorder among them. But as I trauelled on a time through the field where the battell was striken, with Metrius Florus that had beene Conful: he shewed me an olde man that when the field was fought in that place, was younge, and against his will was at the same battell on Othoes parte. G Who told vs, that after the battell was fought, he came into the field to furney the number of those that were dead; and he found the dead bodies piled on a heape, of the height of those that came to view them. And fayd moreouer, that he made inquierie of the matter, but he nether could imagine it him felfe, nor be fatisfied by others. Now in deede it is likely, that in cinil warres betwene contry men of one felf citie, where one of the two armies is ouerthrowen. that there should be greater slaughter among them, then against the other enemies, bicause they take no prisoners of either side: for those they should take, would serve them to no good purpose. But after they were flaine, one to be layed on heapes so by another, that is a hard thing to judge. But now to the matter. The newes of this ouerthrowe came first but obscurely vnto Otho, a common thing in a matter of so great importance: but afterwardes, when some D that were hurt came and brought him certen newes of it, it was no maruell then to see Othoes friendes and familliers to comfort him, who prayed him to be of good cheere, and not to be discoraged for that. Howbeit, the wonderfull great loue and good will which the privat souldiers shewed vnto him at that time, did passe and exceede all speech and education. For they for looke him not, nether went they to fubmit them felues to their enemies the conquerors, fuctions, onnether tooke they any regard of them felues, to fee their Emperour in that dispayre: but all of them joyntly together went vnto his lodging, and called him their Emperour, Then he came our, and they fell downe at his feete, as men represented in a triumphe lying on the ground, & killed his hands, with the teares ronning downe their cheekes, and befought him not to forfake and leave them to their enemies, but to commaund their persons whilest they had one H drope of blud left in their bodies to doe him feruice. All of them together made this petition to him. But amongest others, there was a poore souldier drawing out his sword, sayd vnto The wonderhim: know, O Cefar, that all my companions are determined to dye in this fort for thee, and full corage of a fanddier of fo flue him felfe. But all thefe lamentable things did neuer melt Othoes hart: who looking with University and talking his eyes every where, spake vnto them in this maner. I thinke this a more happy day for me, my fellowes, then that in the which you first chose me Emperour: to see you loue me so well, and doe me such honor, with so great thew of loyaltie. But yet I befeech you not to deny me of a greater fauor, which is: to dye valliantly, and honorably, for the safetie of so many honest men as you be, and so good Citizens of Rome. If by your election you made me worthy to take vpon me the Imperiall crowne: I p " must now needes shewe my selfe an Emperour, not sparing to spend my life, for your and my contries fafetie. I am certen that the victorie is not altogether myne enemies. For newes are

So when he had made " this oration vnto them, and put those by, that would have diffwaded him the contrary: he commaunded all the Senators and his friendes that were present, to anovde. Then he wrote letters to them that were absent, and also vnto the cities wherethrough they passed, to vie them very curteoufly, and to fee them fafely conueyed. Then came his Nephewe Cocceius The Emperor to him, who was yet but a younge boye, and he did comfort him, and bad him nor to be af- Othors words frayd of Vitellius, for he had fafely kept his mother, wife, and children, and had bene as care- Cocceius. full of them, as if they had bene his owne: and that he would not yet adopt him for his fonne. though he was desirous to doe it, vntill such tyme as he sawe the ende of this warre: to thend that if he ouercame, he should equietly raigne Emperour with him: and if he were ouer-C come, that for adopting of him, he woulde not be cause of his death. But this one thinge onely, I commaunde and charge thee, my fonne, euen as the last commaundement that I can giue thee: that thou doe not forget altogether, nether ouer much remember, that thyne Vncle hath bene Emperour . When he had colde him this tale, he heard a novie at his dore: they were the fouldiers that threatned the Senators which came from him, and woulde kill them, if they did not remayne with him, but would for sake their Emperour . Vpon this occasion he came out once againe among them, being affrayd least the fouldiers would doe the Senators some hurt, and made the souldiers give backe, not by intreating of them, nor speaking curteously to them, but looking grymly on them, and in greatrage: insomuch that they all shroncke backe, and went away for feare. So when night came, he was a thirst, and dranke Da litle water: and having two fwordes, he was proving a great while which had the best edge. In the ende, he put by the one, and kept the other in his armes. Then he began to comfort his fernaunts, and liberally to gine out his money amonge them, to some more, to some leffe, not prodigally throwing it away without difcretion, as being another mans money: but difcreetely gaue to enery man according to his defert. Then after he had dispatched them away, he laid odo in his him down to sleepe al the rest of the night, that the groomes of his chamber heard him snort, death, seemed he flept fo fowndly. In the morning he called one of his infranchifed bondmen, whom he had to follow case commaunded to helpe to faue the Senators, and fent him to feeif they were all fafe, & gone. So when he understoode that they were all gone, and that they had all they would: come on, faid he then vnto him, looke to thy felfe I reade thee, and take heede the fouldiers fee thee not, E if thou wilt scape with life, for sure they will kill thee, thinking thou hast holpen me to kill my felfe. So affoone as his infranchifed bondman was gone out of his chamber, he toke his fword othe flue him with both his hands, and fetting the poynt of it to his breft, he fell downe vpon it, feeming to felfe. feele no other payne, fauing that he fetched a fighe: whereby they that were without, knewe that he had done him selfe hurt. Thereuppon his friendes made straight an outcry, and all the campeand citie was incontinently full of teares and lamentacion. The fouldiers fodainly ran with a great noyle to his gates, where they bitterly bewayled, and lamented his death, falling out with them selues that they were such Villaines so slenderly to have garded their Emperour, that they kept him not from killing him felfe for their fakes. So there was not a man of them that left his body, though the enemies were hard at hand; but having honorably bury-

Others that could not come neare him, honored A him, and did reuerence him a farre of, and some there were also that after the stacke of woode was fet a fire, flue them felues hard by the fire: who had neuer received benefit by him that was dead, (at the least to any mans knowledge) nether had they any occasion to be affraid of him, that was Conqueror. And truely me thinkes, neuer king nor tyrant was fo ambitiously given to raigne, as they vehemently defired to be commaunded by Otho, and to obeye him: confidering that their defire left them not even after his death, but was fo lively rooted in their mindes, that in the ende, it turned to a deadely hate vnto Vitellius. But of this we will speake more hereafter in time and place. Now, when they had buried Othoes ashes, they did fet vp a tombe for him, nether for magnificence of building, nor forglorious epitaphe, subject vnto enuy, For I have seene his tombe in the citie of BRESSELLES, a meane thing, and the epitaph B vpon it translated out of Latine, sayeth no more but this: This is the tombe of Marcus Otho. He dyed being but feuen and thirty yere olde, and was Emperor but three moneths: & there were as many famous men that commended his death, as they that reproued his life. For though he lived not much more honester then Nero, yet he dyed farre more honorably. Furthermore, when Pollio one of the Captaines would have compelled his fouldiers prefently to have taken their othes to be true to Vitellius, they fell out with him: and understanding that there were yet remayning some Senators, they would not medle with them, but onely troubled Verginius Rufus. For they came to his dores armed, and called him by his name, & commaunded him to take charge of them, and to goe as Ambassador to intreate for them. Howbeit he thought it were but a fond part of him to take charge of them that were already ouer- C. come, confidering he refused it when they had ouercome: and also he was affraid to goe

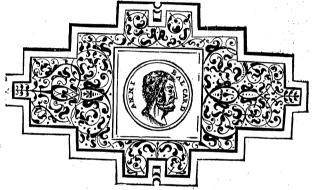

Ambassador to the Germaines, bicause he had compelled them to doe thinges against their willes. Therefore he went out at his backe dore, and saued him felfe. So when the fouldiers heard of it they were at length contented to be brought to be sworne vnto Vitellius, and so ioyned them selues with Cecinnaes fouldiers, fo they might be pardoned for all that was past.

LIVES OF ANNIBA AND SCIPIO AFRICAN.

Translated into French by Charles de la Stuce, and englished by Thomas North.

Fwe doe call to mind the first Punick warre the Carthaginians had with the Romanes: we shall find many Captaines, who by the el glorye of their noble deedes, haue left great fame and renowme vnto their posteritie. Howbeit amongest all the Captaines of the CAR-THAGINIANS, none are found more worthy of fame, and so commen-2 ded of all Greeke and Latine Authors, then Hamilear, Annibals fa- The partiage Tther, otherwise surnamed Barcha, a valliant man doubtles, and in his of Annibal. time a skilfull fouldier as any was. The fame Hamilear first of all made warre with the Romanes, alonger tyme in Sicilia then was looked for, who had done greate hurte to his contrye and common wealthe. After that also in B the warres of Africk (at what tyme the mercenarye fouldiers through their rebellion did put the contrye of CARTHAGE in greate daunger) he did so valliantly appeale the insurrection: that to enery mans judgement, he was reputed the onely preserver of his contrye. Then he was sent Gouernor and Captaine into Spayne, and caryed with him at that tyme, (as it is reported) his sonne Annibal, beeing but a younge boye, where he did noble sernice. In fine, in the nynth yeare of his aboade there in that prouince, he dyed fighting vallyantly agaynste the VETHEONS. After his deathe, Hafdrubal his Sonne in lawe, CCCCC ii

Haldrubal fent for Annibal into SPAYNE, after his father Hamilcars death, against the minds of the chiefe of the contrary faction, to thendthat as he had bene trayned from his youth in the discipline of warres, in his father Hamilears life: euen so in like manner, that now being come to mans state, he should the better harden his body, to away with the paines and daungers of the warres. Now although at the first, the remembraunce of his father was a great helpe vnto him to winne the loue and good will of the fouldiers: Yet he him felfe afterwards, through his diligence and industrie to handled the matter, that the oldesouldiers forgetting all other Captaines, they onely defired to choose him (and none other) for their gouernor. For they found in him all the perfections that could be wished for, in a noble Captaine or generall. He R had a present and ready wit to give counsell what was to be done, in most greatest attempts: & besides, he lacked nether manhood nor industry to put it in execution. He had a valiant and inuincible mind, euen in greatest daungers and aduersities of bodye: the which are wontto staye others from performing their indeuors and duety. He would watche and warde as any private fouldier, and was quicke and ready to doe any kind of service, either like a valiant souldier, or a good Captaine. In this fort Annibal continued in feruice in the warres, the space of three yeares, under the conduct of Hasdrubal. In that time he so wanne the hartes of all the army, that immediatly after Haldrubals death, he was chosen to be Lieuetenant generall, with the common consent of all the fouldiers: & this honor was layed vpon him without contradiction of any of the Carthaginians, through the friendship and good will of the Barci- C NIAN faction. Annibal was now fix and twenty yeare olde, when the fouldiers made him their asterne denbaf Haf- Lieuetenant generall. For at what time his father Hamilear brought him into Spayne, he was drubal bring then but nyne yeare olde: & from that time vnto Hafdrubals death (according to Polybius declaration) it was senenteene yeares more. So he was no sooner made Lieuetenant generall of all the campe, and his contry: but he bent him felfe to make warre with the ROMANES, hauing Diners confer long before determined it. For first of all be chiefly mainteyned almost a common hate of all the CARTHAGINIANS against the ROMANES, bicause of the losse of Sicilia and SARDINIA. Besides also, he bare them a secret malice in nature, as a thing inheritable from his father Hamilear: who, of all the Captaines the Carthaginians euer had, was the mortallest enemye vnto the Romanes. And it is written also, that at what time Hamilear made his preparation to D goe into Spayne, he compelled Annibal being but a boy, to sweare in a sacrifice he made, that he would be a mortal enemy to the Romanes, affoone as euer he came to the state of a man. So, the remembrance of these things were still fresh in the young mans minde, as the Idea (or image) of his fathers hate, and still prouoked him to spie out all the meanes he could, how to destroy the Empire of Rome. Besides also, the BARCINIAN factioneuer left to prick him forward vnto it, bicause bywars he might raise him self to greatnes, & so increase his estate. These causes, aswell common as perticuler, inticed Annibal to attempt warre against the ROMANES. and gaue the flowt young man occasion by these meanes to practise innouation. There was a people at that time called the SAGVNTINES, who confyned indifferently betwixt the Ro-MANES and CARTHAGINIANS: and were left free by the former peace concluded. These SA- E GUNTINES euer after tooke part with the ROMANES: and by meanes of the league that was made betwixt them, the ROMANES alwayes found them very true and faithfull to the Empire of Rome. Annibal therfore thought with him felf, he could not deuise to make a better match to anger the ROMANES with all, and to kindle the fire of his malice also against them: then to make warre with the SAGVNTINES, their confederats. Howbeit, before he would be openly seene to set vpon them, he first determined to leade his armye against the O LCADES, and other people on the other side of the river of Iberus: and after he had ouercomen them, then to finde occasion to molest the SAGVNTINES, to make it appeare that the warre was rather begonne by them, then purposely intended by him. So after he had ouercome the O LCADES, he did fet vpon the VACCEIANS, spoyled their contry, besieged many cities, and R tooke HERMANDICE, and ARBOCOLE, greate and riche cities. Nowe, the taking of this fo wealthie a citie, was a great furtherance divers wayes to Annibals encorprises. For many cities taking example of the facke of Sagyn tys, who before milliking so he fubicate othe Canting any ans, were ready to rebell; they kept them selves quiet, and the souldiers also waxed linely and coragious, seeing the rich spoyles that were deuided in the campe. So Annibal sent great presents of the spoiles of the SAGYNTINES VIITO CARTHAGE, whereby he wanne the chiefest men of the citie, and made them like the better of warres? whomehe determined to leade with him against the ROMANES, not in SPAYNE, as many supposed, but into by he vit felfe, Whilest these matters were in hande, the Ambaffadors returned from Caren a ge to Rome, and declared in open C Senate, the stender aunswer they had received in manner at the selfesame time when they had intelligence of the facke of SAGYNTVS : Hereuppon the Romanes greatly repented them felues, (though fomewhat too late) for that they ayded not their friendes and confederats in fo great a daunger. Therefore all the Senate and people together, being very fory for it, and therewith also maruelously offended they deuided the provinces vato the Confuls, to wete: SPAY HB VARO Publing Cornelius, and AFRICE and STOTETA also vato Titus Sempronius. Afterwards, certen of the noblest men of the citie were sent ambassadors voto CARTHAGE, to make their complaints in open Senate for breache of the peace, and also to denownce vnto them the cause of the warre to come, and therewith boldly to proclaime open warre against them, after they had declared the occasion thereof to come of them selnes. This was as brauely re- D ceiued of the CARTHAGINIANS, as luftely offred vnto them : buttherein they were not fo wel aduised, as the successe of that warrein the ende sufficiently proued it to them. Now Annibal being advertised how things were concluded in the Senate at CARTHAGE, and thinking with him selfe that it was time to goe into ITALY, as he had determined from the beginning : he made all the politible speede he could to prepare his shippes and things ready, and so required ayde of the cities that were his best friends and confederats, and commaunded that all the bands hould meete him at newe CARTHAGE. So when he came to GADES, heappoynted good garrifons in places most convenient, in A FRICK and SPAY NE, which he thought about althings, els to be most necessary: bicause that when he should goe into ITALY, the ROMANES should not winne it from him. Therefore he sent into A FRICK, twelve hundred horsemen, E. & thirteene thow fand footemen, all Spanyages; and befides, he brought out of divers parts of A.F. M. Car foure thow fand fouldiers, and placed them in garrifon in CARTHAGE, obteying both hoftages and fouldiers by this meanes. So heleft the government of Spay NE to his brother. Haldrubal, and gaue him an army of fiftye shippes of warre, two shows and horsemen, and twelue; thow and footemen. These were the garrisons he left in both those prouinces. Nowe he shought them not sufficient to withstande the power of the ROMANES, if they bent their warresingo Spayne, or Africk: but bicause he thought them stronge inough to stay the enemy from ouerrunning of the contry; untill that having brought his armye by land, he had fet foote in I TALT Moreover, he knewe that the CARTHAGINIANS were stronge inough to leastly a new army if they lysted , and if neede so required , to fend him-ayde also into I TALY. Thus order being taken for all things in AFRICES, and SPAYNE: Amilal returned againe to new. CARTHAGE, where his armic was readie for him, and well appointed. Thereuppon, the next day following he departed from CARTHAGE, and brought his armie all alongest the coast; wnto the river of Iberus. It is reported, that the next night following, Annibal dreamed he saw a young man, of a maruelous terrible looke & Annibale next night to lowing. It is not to be marueled at, though the great care & thought he tooke in the day time for the warre of ITALIE, made his mind to run of fuch fanfies in the night, as dreaming of victory or destructio, or such other C calamities of warre. For they are things that happen often, as Cicero the Orator faith: that our thoughts & words do beget fuch things in our dreame, as Ennius the Poet wryteth of Homers to wit, like to those his minde most ran on, or that he talked of most. Now, after Annibal had passed ouer the mountaines Pirenei, and that he had also won the Gavies harts with bountifull gifts: in few dayes he came to the river of Rhone. not paffe over. Now, though Annibal had wonne all the other GAVLES, yet those he coulde neuer winne neither by gifts, nor threats, to cause them rather to proue the frendship of the CARTHAGINIANS, then their force. Therefore Annibal perceiving he was to handle fuch enemies rather by policy, he commaunded Hanno the sonne of Bomilear, secretly to passe oner the river of Rhone, with parte of the armie, and so to set woon the GAVYES on the soddine. Thereupon Hanno as he was commaunded, made a long iorney, and hatting paffed ouer the river at passable fords: he shewed him selse hard by the enemies campe before they saw him, E or that they knew e what it was. The GAVLE's hearing their showtes and cries behinde them, and having their handes full of Annibal before them, who had many botes ready to paffe ouer his men: they having no leafure to confult of the matter, neither to arme them selves to stande to defense, left their campe, and fled for life. So they being driven from the other fide of the river, the rest of the armie of the GARTHAGINIANS passed ouer it with fafetie. In the meane time, P. Cornelius Scipio; that but a litle before was comen vnto Mass ILIA; ftill heard P. Comelius newes of Annibals armie. Wherefore, to be more affured of the matter, he fent a bande of Scipio Confade choyce horsemen to discouer what the enemies intent was: who making great speede as they denistrated were commaunded, met by chaunce with fine hudred horsemen of the NV MIDIAN S, Whom winds at Annibal had also fent to bring him word of the Romanes armie. this meanes founde where the Romanes lay and stoode in a great dour with him felfer whis A ther he shoulde keepe on his way into I was not clie lead insarmic against the Conful that then was and fo to proughts happe & successe. At length, debating many wayes in his mind, and vincertaine which way he would determine the Ambaffadors of the Botans perswaded him to leave all other deniles, and to goe on into I TALIE. Fon before that stanibal had paffed ouer the mountaines Pirenei the BOIANS having by craft taken the ROMANES Ambaffadors, and done great mischiefe vnto Manlim the Prestor, and intifed the Ingvintions also : they were renolted from the ROMANES, and tooke parte with Annibal, and onely bigging the Ro-& take parte MANES hadreplenished the cities of PLACENT LAYAND CREMONA with people, and had made them Colonies to Rome. So Annibal being ruled by their counfell, railed his campe, and keping the rivers fide, ftill going against the river in few dayes he came to the place which the # GAVLES doe call the Iland, the which the river of Arar and Rhodanus comming from divers mountaines doe make there. So at this present, there is the famous citie of Lion in Gaven, which they fay was built long time after, by Planeus Munating: From thence he came to the contrie of the ALLOBROGES, and having pacified the variance between two brethren for the realme, he came through the contrie of the CASTINIANS and VOIC ONTIANS, to the river of Durance. The head of this river commeth from the Alpes, and from thence running with a swift streame, falleth into the river of Rhone: & as it oftentimes channeth her course, fo hath it in manner no passable forde. Yet Annibal having passit over, he led his armie vnto the Alpes, through open and plaine contries, as farre as he coulde: howebeings he passed through them, he had great loffes, as it is reported. Infomuche that fome which were living & at that time, did affirme, that they heard Annibal him felfe fay, that he had loft aboue thirtie thowsand men, and the most parte of his horsemen. For he was forced nor only to fight with the inhabitants of the mountaines, but also compelled to make wayes through the straights: fo that in certaine places of the highest rockes, he was driven to make passages through, by force of fire and vineger. So when he had passed the Alpes in fifteene dayes space, he came downe into the valley, not farre from the citie of TVRINE, Whereby it seemeth to me, that he passed ouer the mountaine they commonly called Genua, the which on the one side of it The valley of hath the river of Druentia, and on the other fide it goeth downe to the city of TVRINE. Now it is hard to fay truly, what number of men he had when he was comen into I TALIE: bicause of mens disterlities of opinions. For fome wryte, that he had a hundred thowfand footemen, D and twentie thowfand horsemen: others also write, that he had twentie thowsand sootemen, and fixe thowfand horsemen, all A FRIKANS and SPANYARDES, But others, reckoning the GAVLES and LIGVRIAS, doe count foure score thowsande sootemen, and tenne thowsande horsemen. Yet it is not credible, that his armie was so great, as the first men report, and specially having passed through so many contries, and also received such losse as he had; neither also could his number be so small, as the second reporters doe make it, if a man will consider the famous exploytes and great enterprises he did afterwardes. So that I like their opinions Anniballs are best, which keepe the meane betwene them both : considering that he brought into IT ALTE, the better parte of fourescore thowsand footemen, and tenne thowsand horsement the which he had leavied in Spayne: as it is manifestly known also, that a great number of the Liev- E RIANS and GAVLES came to joyne with him, for the great malice they bare vnto the Ro-MANES, that gaue no place nor grounde vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, So Annibal being comen from TVRINE, into the contrie of the INSYBRIANS: he was met withall by Publius Cornelius Scipio, who marching with wonderfull speede from MASSILIA, and having passed the rivers of Po and Telin, he camped not farre from the enemie. So shortly after, both the Generalls being comen into the field to view eche others campe; the horsemen of either fide grew to skirmith, which continued long, and was not to be difcerned which of them had the better. Howbeit in the end, the ROMANES feeing the Conful hurt, and also that the horsemen of the NVMIDIANS, by litle and litle came to compasse them in: they were driven to geue and vitterie, ground, and so prettly retyred, defending the Conful the best they could to fauchim, and so g at length recourred their campe. It is reported that Publim Cornelius Scipio, was faued at that time through his sonnes helpe, who afterwardes mas called A PRICAN, and at that time was

A but a young stripling: whose praise though it was wonderfull in so greene a youth, yesit is from bit enter likelie to be true, bicause of the famous and valliant actes he did afterwardes. Nowe Sei- mies bi pio having proved how much his enemie was stronger then him selse in horsemen; he deter- some, who mined to place his campe so, as his sootemen might be in best salety, & also sight with greatest words called aduantage. And therefore the next night following he passed the river of Po, and made as litle noyse as he coulde, and went vnto PLACENTIA. The like shortlie after did T. Sempranius Longus, who had bene restored from banishment by the Senate, and sent for out of Sicilia. bicause both the Consuls should gouerne the common wealth by one selfe authoritie. Anni- P. Cornelland bal also followed them both with all his armie, and pitched his campe neere vnto the river of Scipio, and Trebia: hoping that bicause both campes lay so neere together, some occasion would be of-B fred to fight, the which he chieflie desired, both bicause he couldenot long maintaine warre consults a. for lacke of vittells, as also that he mistrusted the fickelnes of the G AVLES. Who, like as they gainst Annie foone fell in league and frendship with him, drawen vnto it with hope of chaunge, and with Tribias, the fame also of his victorie obtained: so he mistrusted that youn any light occasion (as if the warre should continue any long time in their contrie) they would turne all the hate they bare vnto the Romanes, against him, as the only author of this warre. For these respectes therefore, he deuised all the meanes he could to come to battell. In the meane time, Sempronius the other Conful, met with a troupe of the enemies, loden with spoyle, stragling vp and downe the fieldes, whom he charged, and put to flight. So imagining the like successe of all the battell, by this good fortune he had met withall: he had good hope of victorie, if once both the C armies might come to fight. Therefore being maruelous desirous to doe some noble enterprise before Scipio were recoursed of his hurt, and that the new Conful should be chosen: he determined to joyne battell against the will of his other colleague and fellowe Consul Scipio, who thought nothing could be to lesse purpose, then to put all the state and common wealth in icopardie, speciallie having all the whole GAVLES in maner in the field against him. Now, Annibal had secret intelligence of all this variance, by spialls he had sent into the enemies campe. Wherefore, he being politike and futtle as he was, found out a place straight betwene Ambuft laire both campes, couered ouer with bushes and briers, and there he placed his brother Mago to by Annibal lye in ambush, with a companie of chosen men. Then he commaunded the horsemen of the Sempronius, NVMIDIANS, to scurrie to the trenches of the Romanes, to intile him to come to battell; and D thereupon made the refidue of his armie to eate, and fo put them in verie good order of battell, to be readie vpon any occasion offered. Now the Conful Sempronius, at the first tumult of the N VM IDIANS, fodainly fent his horsemen to encounter them, and after them put out six thowsande footemen, and in the ende, came him selfe out of his campe with all his armie. It was then in the middest of winter, and extreame cold, and speciallie in the places inclosed about the Alpes, and the mountaine Appenine. Nowe the Numidians as they were commaunded, intifed the ROMANES by litle and litle on this fide the river of Trebia, vntill they came to the place where they might discerne their ensignes: and then they sodainlie turned vpon the enemies which were out of order. For it is the manner of the NVMIDIANS, often- Annibal times to flie of fet purpole, and then to flay vpon the fodaine when they fee time, to charge Semprenius E their enemie more hottely and fiercely then before. Whereuppon Sempronius incontinently the conful, at gathered his horsemen together, and did set his men in battell ray, as time required, to gene the riber of charge vpon his enemie, that flayed for him in order of battell. For Annibal had cast his men The Name into iquiadrons, readie vpon any occasion. The skirmith beganne first by the light horsemen, dian crediting & afterwards increased hotter by supplie of the men of armes: howbeit the Romans Knights symp. being vnable to beare the shocke of the enemies, they were quickelie broken. So that the legions maintained the battell with fuch furie & noble corage, that they had bene able to have refifted, fo they had fought but with footemen onely. But on the one fide, the horsemen and

and cries, and that the middle foundron of the CARTHAGINIANS also (through Annibals A comaundement) flew vpon the CENOMANIANS. Then the ROMANES feeing their confederats flie, their harts were done, and vtterly discoraged. It is fayd that there were tenne thowsande footemen of the Romanes gotto Placentia, and came through the enemies. The rest of the armie that fledde, were most parte of them slaine by the CARTHAG INIANS. The Conful Annibale vi- Sempronius also scaped verie narowhe from the enemies. The victorie cost Annibal the setting on also: for he lost a great number of his men, and the most parte of all his Elephantes were flaine. After this battell, Annibal ouercame all the contrie, and did put all to fire and sworde, and tooke also certaine townes: and with a few of his men made a great number of the contrie men flie, that were disorderlie gathered together in battell. Then at the beginning of the foring, he brought his army into the field fooner then time required; & meaning to goe into R Thus can he was driven backe by a great tempelt at the verie toppe of the height of the Appenine, and so compelled to bring his armie about PLACENTEA: how beit shortly after he put himselfe againe into the fields for divers vigent & necessary causes. For had he not saved him felse by that policie, he had almost bene taken tardie by the ambush of the GAVLES: who being angry with him that the warre continued fo long in their contry, they fought to be reuenged of him, as the only author & occasion of the warre. Therefore perceiuing it was time for him to anoyde this daunger, he made all the half he could to leade his armie into some other prouince. Furthermore, he thought it would increase his estimacion much amog straugers. & also greatly encorage his owne people, if he could make the power of the CARTHAGINIANS to feeine fo great, & alfo their Captaine to be of fo noble a corage, as to dare to make warre fo C. neere to the citie of Rome. All things therefore fet a part, he marched with his campe by the mountaine Appenine, and so comming through the contry of the Ligy Rians, he came into THYS CAN, by the way that bringeth them into the champion contry, & to the mariffes about the river of Arnus. The river of Arnus at that time was very high, and had overflowen all the fields thereabouts. Annibal therefore marching with 10 great an army as he had, could not avoyde it, but that he must needes lose a number of his men & horse, before he could get out of those euill fauored marisses. Insomuch that he him selfe lost one of his eyes, by reason of the great paines he had taken day & night without fleepe or rest, and also through the euill aver: though he was carried upon a high Elephants back, which only was left him of all that he had brought with him. In the meane time, C. Flaminius Conful, to whom the charge of Sepronius D army was genen; he was come vnto Aretiv magainst the Senates minde, who were margeloufly offended with him, bicause he left his copanion Cn. Seruilius at Rome, & went vnto his Lines, Confuls. province by stellth as it were, without the furniture of a Conful & his officers. This was a very hasty man of nature, & one whom the people had brought to that dignity & office: so that he was become fo prowde & infolent that men might fee he would hazard all things without wir or judgement. Annibal having intelligence hereof, thought it the best way to anger the Conful. & to do what he could possible to allure him into the field, before his fellow Conful should come to joyne with him. Therfore, he marching forward with his campe through the contry of FESVLA, & ARETIVM, he burnt & spoiled all the contry thereabout, & filled them all with feare, neuer leauing to destroy all before him, vntil he came to the mountaines Cortonenses, E & fo to the lake called Thrafimene. When he had viewed the place, he went about to furprise Lacus Thra his enemy by some ambush: wherupon he conucied certen horsemen vnder the hills, hard by the straight that goeth vnto Thrasimene, and behind the mountaines also, he placed his light horseme. The he him selfe with the rest of his army came downe into the field supposing that the Conful would not be quiet: and so it fell out. For hot stirring heades are easely intrapped, The indge. & fall into the enemies ambush, & oftentimes do put all in hazard, bicause they will follow no counfell nor good aduife, C. Flamining therefore, feeing their contry vtterly spoiled, the corne destroyed and cur downe, and the houses burnt: he made great hast to lead his armie against the enemie, contrarie to all mens minds, who would have had him taried for his companion Cn. Servilius the other Conful. So even at funne set, when he was come to the straightes of p the lake of Thrasimene, he caused his campe to stay there, although his men were not wear rie with the long iomey they had taken by the way. So the next morning by breake of day,

A making no view of the contrie, he went ouer the mountaines. Then Annibal who long before was prepared for this, did but flay for the oportunitie to worke his feate: when he faw the Ro- Band hee MANES come into the plaine, he gaue a fignall vnto all his men to geue charge vpon the enemie. Thereuppon the CARTHAGINIANS breaking out on euerie side, came before and behinde, and on the flanckes to affaile the enemie, being thut in between the lake and the moun- the Conful, taines. Now in contrarie maner, the Romanes beginning to fight out of order, they fought by the lake inclosed together, that they could not see one an other, as if it had bene darke: so that it is to ne. be wondered at, how, and with what minde they fought it out fo long, confidering they were compassed in on euerie side. For they fought it out about three howres space, with such fury The Romanes

Furthermore the report went, that there were fix thow lande footemen which forciblie Plante in (at the beginning of the battell) got to the mountaine, and there stayed on a hill till the battell the life of Fawas ended, and at length came downe vpon Annibals promise: but they were betrayed, and bim Maxi. flaine, euery mothers sonne of them. After this great victorie, Annibal did let divers I TALIAN to avenue prisoners goe free without raunsome paying, after he had vied them maruelous curteouslie: Prisoners.

C bicause that the same of his elemencie & curtesie should be knowen ynto all nations, whereas artimetes in deede his owne nature was contrarie to all vertues. For he was hastie and cruell of nature, dissemble and from his youth was brought vp in warres, and exercised in murther, treason, & ambushes with layed for enemies: and neuer cared for law, order, nor civill government. So by this meanes difficultion of he became one of the cruellest Captaines, the most suttell, and craftiest to deceiue and intrap his enemie, that euer was. For as he was alway prying to beguile the enemie: fo those whom he could not ouercome in warre by plaine force, he went about to intrappe by flight and policie. The which appeareth true by this present battell, and also by the other he fought against the Conful Sempronius, by the river of Trebia. But let vs returne to our matter, and leave this talke till an other time. Now when the newes of the ouerthrow and death of the Conful Fla-

D minius was reported at Rome, having lost the most parte of his armie: there was great mone and lamentation made through all the citie of Rome. Some bewailing the common miserie of the common wealth, others lamenting their private particular loffe, & some also forowing for both together. But in deede it was a woefull fight, to fee a world of men & women to run to the gates of the citic, euerie one prinarly asking for their kinne and frends. Some do write, Extreme that there were two women, who being very force and penfife, dispairing of the safetie of their joy causes the fonnes, dyed fodainly for the extreame ioy they had, when beyond their expectacion & hope they fawe their fonnes aliue and fafe. At the selfe same time, Cn. Seruilius, the other Conful with C. Flaminius, did fend him foure thowfand horfemen, not vnderstanding yet of the battell that was fought by the lake of Thrasymene . But when they heard of the ouerthrowe of

E their men by the way, and therefore thought to haue fled into V MBRIA: they were compaffed in by the horsemen of the enemies, and so brought vnto Annibal. Nowe the Empire of Rome being brought into fo great extreamitie and daunger, bicause of so many small losses one in the necke of an other: it was ordeined, that an extraordinarie Gouernor or Magistrate should be chosen, who should be created Dictator : an office specially vsed to be referred for The office of the last hope and remedie, in most extreame daunger and perill, of the state and common Difficus, wealth. But bicause the Conful Servilius could not returne at that time to Rome, all the waies "bas effect, being kept by the enemie: the people contrarie to their custome, created Q. Fabius Dictator, Q. Fabius (who afterwards attained the furname of Maximus, to fay, verie great) who likewife did name Maximus,

M. Minutius Generall of the horfemen. Now this Fabius was a graue and wife confeller, and Grated Dis-F of great authoritie and estimacion in the common wealth: informethe as the citizens had all their hope and confidence in him onely, perswading them selves, that the honor of Roma might be better preserved vnder the gouernment and conduct of such a Generall, rather then vnder the gouernment of any other man whatfoeuer. So Fabius knowing it very well, after he A had carefullie and diligentlie geuen order for all thinges necessarie: he departed from Romes and when he had received the armie of the late Conful Cn. Servilius, he added vnto them two other legions, and so went vnto the enemie. Nowe Annibal was gone from the lake of Thrasymene, and went directly towardes the citie of Spoletym, to see if he could take it at the first assault. But when he saw that the townes men stoode vpon the rampers of the walls, and valliantlie defended them felues: he then left the towne, and destroyed the contrie as he went, and burnt houses and villages, and so went into Apvlia, through the marches of An-CONA, and the contries of the MARSIANS and PELIGNIANS. The Dictator followed him at the heeles, and camped hard by the citie of ARPY, not farre from the campe of the enemie, to thend to drawe out the warre at length. For the rashnesse and soolehardines of the former B Captaines affore time, had brought the state of Rome into such miserie: that they thought it a victorie vnto them, not to be ouercome by the enemie, that had so often ouercome them. Whereby all thinges were turned straight with the chaunge and alteracion of the Captaine. For, though Annibal had fet his men in battell ray, and afterwardes perceiuing his enemie sturred not, went and destroyed the contrie, hoping thereby to intife the Dictator to fight, when he should see the contrie of his confederates so spoyled, as it was before his face; the Dictator, this notwithstanding, was not moved withall, but still kept his men close together, as if the matter had not concerned him. Annibal was in a maruelous rage with the delay of the Dictator, and therefore often removed his campe, to the ende that going divers wayes, fome occasion or oportunitie might fall out to deceiue the enemie, or elie to geue battell. So C when he had passed the mountaine Appenine, he came vnto Samnivm. But bicause shortlie after, some of CAMPANIA, who having bene taken prisoners by the lake of Thrasymene, had bene fet at libertie without raunsome: they putting him in hope that he might take the citie of C APVA, he made his armie march forward, and tooke a guide that knew the contrie, to bring him vnto Casinv M. Nowe the guide ouerhearing Casinv M, vnderstoode it Casi-LINVM, & fo mistaking the found of the word, brought the armie a cleane contrary way vnto CALENTINVM, and CALENVM, and from thence about Stella. So when they came into a contry environned about with mountaines and rivers, Annibal knew straight they had mistaken their way, and so did cruelly put the guide to death. Fabius the Dictator, did in the meane time beare all this pacientlie, and was contented to geue Annibal libertie to take his pleasure D which way he woulde: vntill he had gotten the mountaines of Gallicanum, and Cafilinum, where he placed his garrifon, being places of great aduantage and commodity. So the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS was in manner compassed in enery way, and they must needes have dyed for famine in that place, or else have fled, to their great shame and dishonor; had not Annibal by this stratageame preuented the daunger. Who knowing the daunger all his armie stoode in, and having spied a fit time for it: he commaunded his fouldiers to bring forth two thowfand oxen which they had gotten in spoyle in the fields, having great store of them, and raines of Gal. then tying torches or fire linckes vnto their hornes, he appointed the nimblest men he had ticamon, and to light them, and to drive the oxen up the hill to the toppe of the mountaines, at the reliefe Cafilinum, a- of the first watche. All this was duely executed according to his commaundement, and the E oxen running up to the toppe of the mountaines with the torches burning, the whole armie marched after them faver and foftly. Now the Romanes that had long before placed a ftrong garrison vpon the mountaines, they were affrayed of this straunge fight, and mistrusting some ambulhe, they foorthwith for fooke their peeces and holdes. Fabius him felfe mistrusting also that it was some stratageame of the enemie, kept his men within the campe, and coulde not well tell what to fay to it. In the meane time, Annibal got ouer the mountaine, not farre from the bathes of Sweffa, which the contrie men doe call the tower of the bathes, and brought all his armie safe into ALBA: and shortlie after, he marched directlie as though he woulde goe to Rome, howbeit he fodainlie turned out of the way, and went presentlie into Apvlia. There he tooke the citie of GLERENVM, a verie riche and wealthie towne, where he deter- F mined to winter. The Dictator followed him harde, and came and camped by LAVRINVM, not farre from the CARTHAGINIANS campe. So he being fent for to Rome about waightie

And the city of Caparallo (the which Annibal was delivous to have won long before) for taking their old frends &confe derats, made new league & frendship with Annibal, the which wan him great estimacion with other nations. For at that time the city of CAPVA was very populous & of great power, & the chiefest city of estimacion of all ITALY, next vnto Rome. Now to tel you in few words what is The citie of reported of Capva, it is certaine that it was a Colony of the Thys cansistie which was first country to colled called, VVLTVRNVM, & after that CAPVA, by the name of their Gouernor called Capita; or of therwife, (as it is most likely) bicause of the fieldes round about it. E feathere dwell the Svessanians, the Cymanians, and the Neapolitans. On firme land also towards the North, are the CALENTINIANS, and the CALENIANS. On the East and South fide, the DAVNIANS and NOLANIANS. Furthermore, the place is of a strong scituacion, and on the one fide is compaffed in with the fea, and on the other fide with great high mountaines. Now the CAMPANIAN'S florished maruelously at that time: and therefore, seeing the ROMANES in maner vitterly vindone by the battel they had loft at CANNES, they quickly tooke parte with the stronger, as it commonly falleth out: and furthermore, besides that they made league with Annibal, they received him into their city with great triumphe, hoping that the warre being ended, they should be the chiefest & wealthiest of all ITALY. But marke how men are commonly deceived in their expectacion. Now, when Annibal came into the city of F CAPVA, there was a worlde of people that went to fee him, for the great fame they heard of him. For there was no other talke, but of his happy victories he had wonne of the enemie. So

who was a man of great wealth and authoritie, as any among all the CAMPANIANS. Then he A made him a notable banket, to the which no citizens were bidden, faming onely Inbellius Tanrea, a flowt man, and the sonne of Passwiss his hoaft; who through his fathers meanes, with much a doe, was reconciled to Annibal, for that Annibal hated him as he did, bicause he followed Decim Magin, who alwayes tooke the Romans parte. But now, let vs confider a litle I pray you, how great men fomtime vnwares are fubicct to great daungers and misfortunes. For this young man diffembling his reconciliacion with Annibal, watching time & occasion notwith flanding to do him force displeasure, in the time of this seast, while they were making merie: he tooke his father aside into a secret corner of the house, and prayed him together with him, by a great good turne, to redeeme the fauor and good will againe of the Romans, the which they had loft through their great wickednesse. Then he tolde him howe he was de- B termined to kill Annibal, the enemy of his contrie, and all ITALIR besides. His father that was a man of great countenance, and authoritie, was marueloufly amazed withall to heare what his some faid:wherfore imbracing him with the reares running downe his cheekes, he praied him to leave of his fword, and to let his gheft be fafe in his house. The which his fonne in the end yeelded to with great a doe. Thus Annibel having before withfloode all the force of his enemies, the ambushes of the GAVLES, and having brought with him also a great army from the fea, and the furdest parte of SPAYNE, through fo many great and mightie nations: he scaped killing verie narrowlie by the hande of a young man, whileft he was at the table making merie. The next morning Annibal had audience in open Senate, where he made great and large promises, and solde them many thinges, which the Campanians caselie beleued, and G therefore flattered them selves, that they should be Lords of all I TALTE: howbeit they reckoned beside their hoast. And to conclude, they did so cowardly submit them selues to Annibal: shat it seemed they had not onely suffered him to come into their citie, but that they had also made him their absolute Lord, like men that neither remembred, nor regarded their libertie. And this appeareth plainlie by one example I will thew you amongest many. Annibal willed them to deliuer him Decius Magius, the head of the contrarie faction to him. Whereunto the Senate not only obeyed with all humilitie, but worft of all, fuffered him to be brought bound into the market place, in the presence of all the people: who, bicause he woulde not for sake the auncient league and frendshippe with the ROMANES, had shewed him selfe a more faithfull citizen to his contrie and common wealth, then vnto the barbarous people. Now whilest D these thinges passed thus in Capva, Mago (Annibals brother) went to Carthage, to report the newes of his happie victorie to his contrie men, which they had wonne of the enemies: and with all, before the Senate to declare the noble exploytes of armes done by Annibal, and to proue the words true he spake, he poored out at the comming in of the Senate house, the golden rings which had bene taken from the ROMANE Knightes: of the which there were (as fome doe report)aboue a bushell full, and as other some doe wryte, aboue three bushells and a halfe. After that, he praied a new supply for Annibals army: the which was graunted him by the Senate with greater toy, the afterwards it was fent. For the CARTHAGINIANS perswading them selues by the things present, that the warre would fall out as fortunate, as the beginning was fayer: they thereuppon decreed to continue the warre, and to aide Annibals attempts, by E leauying of fouldiers. Now no ma withftood this new supply to be sent to Annibal, but Hanno, a perpetuall enemie of the Barcinian faction. Howbeit the CARTHAGINIANS wayed not his counfell and adulfe then, though it tended to peace, and was good counfel for them, as oftentimes before he had vsed the like. So when Annibal had made league with the C AMPANIANS, he led his campe before the citie of NoLA, hoping they would yeeld of them selues without compulsion. And certainlie so had it come to passe, had not the sodaine comming thither of Marcellus the Prator bene, who both kept the people in, pacified the fedition, & repulfed the enemy that was comming into the citie, by a faily he made vpon him at three feuerall gates, chasing & killing them even to their campe, with great losse. This is that noble Captaine and valliant fouldier Marcellus, who with a noble corage made the world knowe that Annibal was p not inuincible. Annibal perceiuing that there was no other way, but to let Nola alone till an other time: he came to ACERRES, and tooke and spoiled it without resistance. Then going on

A further with greater power vnto Castainym, a fit place to offend the Capvans, he went about to win them that lay there in garrison : but when he saw that neither his faver promises. nor otherwise his threates coulde preuaile, he left parte of his armie to besiege the citie, and bestowed the residue in garrisons before the winter season. Howbeit he chose for his chiefest feate and strength the citie of CAPVAS which stoods verie pleasauntlie, and had plentie of all thinges. There it was that Annibals fouldiers being yied to lye hard, and eafely to away with Annibals colde, hunger, and thirft, became then of valliant men, rancke cowardes: of ftrong men, fouldier weaklings: and of feruiceable and ready men, timerous and effeminate persons, through the tast capual daily pleasures they enjoyed at will. For sweete intiting pleasures, do corrupt the strength and corage of the mind, and mans disposition also vnto vettue: moreouer they spoile his wit, and B take all good counsell from him, all which thinges are daungerous formen. And therefore Pleasure, the Plato rightlie calleth pleasure, the bayte of all euils. And doubtlesse in this case, the pleasures baile of all eof CAMPANIA did hurt the CARTHAGINIANS more, then otherwise the highest Alpes, and all the armies of the ROMANES did. For one onelie winter passed ouer in suche pleasure and One winter wantonnes, was of fuch great force to extinguish the vehement corage in the fouldiers: that effective the field as the herican for the foundary and foundary and when they were brought into the fielde at the beginning of the spring, sure you would right made thin a lie haue fayd that they had forgotten all martiall discipline. Thus the winter being passed o- conard. uer, Annibal returned againe to Castlinum, hoping that the citizens within would willingly yeelde vnto him, after they had abidden so long a siege. Howebeit they were bent to abide all extreamity, before they would yeeld to their fo cruell an enemy, although they lacked vit-C tells. Wherefore liuing first by spelt, or beere barley, and afterwards with nuts which they had The bod received of the ROMANES by the river of Vulturnus: they held it out folong, that Annibal in Philes the the end being angry with the continuance of the fiege, he was content to take the citie vpon fine during and including during the continuance of the fiege, he was content to take the citie vpon fine during the continuance of the fiege, he was content to take the citie vpon fine during the continuance of the field the continuance of t composition, the which he had refused before. Now this warre, in the which the CARTHA-Annibals G IN IANS had alwayes had great victories and good fortune, and received any loffe worthy of firest memorie: began at that time to decline, and to fall to great chaunge and alteracion. For the good former league that was made with Philip king of MACEDON, and the newe aide and supplie that was began to faile fent from CARTHAGE, and the taking of PETILIA, CONSENTIA, & of other cities of the contrie of the BRYTIANS, kept the CARTHAG INIANS in good hope. On the other fide, the great Victories which the Romanes had won vpon the enemies in Spayne, & Sardinia, did great-D ly encorage them, and gaue them also good hope that their affaires would prosper better and ly encorage them, and gaue them and good hope that the maximus, Sempronius Gracebus, better. They had also chosen three excellent Captaines, Fabius Maximus, Sempronius Gracebus, Three famous and Marcus Marcellus, a man most worthic of praise for martiall discipline: who so wisely gouerned the affaires of the state, that Annibal found he should make warre with an enemie, no the Romane leffe politike and wife, then hardy and valliant. For first of all, he was driven from the citie of Fablus Ma-CVMES, with great flaughter of his men, by Sempronius Gracehus, and forced to raife his fiege: Sempronius and shortlie after he was ouercomen by Marcellus, in a battell he fought at NoLA. Marcellus vittorie of Annibal at she citte of

ANNIBAL Two fathers For in No LA, the people and Senate were at variance the one against the other as they were A likewife in divers other cities of I TALIE. The common people defitous of chaunge, favored Annibal: and the noble men, and men of authority, tooke part with the people of Rome. So when Annibal went to take the citie of NoLA, Martellas met him with his army in battell ray, as he had often done before, and failed not to fight with him, even arthe first meeting. There the ROMANES ouercame, and draue the enemie with fuch manhood and readines: that if the horsemen which had taken an other way had cometrin in time; as Marcellus commaunded them:no question the CART HAGINIANS had bene veterly ouerthrowen. Annibal after he had retired his army into his campe with great flaughter, he shortly after departed thence, & went into the contry of the SALENTINIANS. For certaineyoung TARENTINEs that had bene taken prisoners in former battells, where the Romanus had bene ouerthrowen, and that were after- B wards delivered free without raunsome: they to shew them selves thankeful, had put Annibal in hope to deliuer him the city of TARBATY M, so he would but bring his army before the city. Annibal intifed by their promifes, did what he could to obteine it, bicaufe he might haue some city vpon the sea in his power, the which he had defired of long time. And in deede of all the cities vpon the sea coast, there was none so meete as TARENTVM, to bring aide out of GRECE thither, & also to furnish the cape with many things that were to be occupied daily. So, thogh this thing was drawen out in length, by the garrison of the ROMANES that valliantlie refifted: vet Annibal neuer gaue ouer his enterprise, vntill that Nico and Philomenes the authors of the treason, had deliuered him the citie into his handes. The ROMANBS kept only the castell, the which is in manner enuironned with the sea on three sides : and on the fourth side, that lay v- C. delinered unpon the firme lande, it was verie strong with rampers and bulwarkes. Annibal perceiving that so Annibal by he coulde doe no good on that fide, bicause of their great strength: he determined to shut yp the mouth of the hauen of TARENTVM, hoping that was the only way to make the ROMANES yeld, when their vittells should be cut from them. Yet the enterprise seemed very hard, bicause the enemies had all the straights of the hauen in their power, and the shippes also that should besiege the issue of the hauen, were shut up in a little narrow place, and were to be drawen out of the hauen, at the foote of the castell, to bring them into the next sea. But when neuer a man of the TARENTINES could deuise how to bring this enterprise to passe: Annibal him selfe perceiued that these shippes might be drawen out of the hauen with certaine engines, & then to cart them through the city to the fea. So having fet cunning workemen in hande with the D matter, the shippes within few daies after were taken out of the hauen, and caried into the sea. and then came and shewed before the barre of the hauen. Thus the citie of TARENTVM being won againe, after the ROMANES had kept it the space of a hundred yeares: Annibal leaving the castell besieged both by sea and land, he returned vnto SAMNIVM. For the Consuls of the ROMANES had spoyled and stripped the CAMPANIANS that went out to forrage, and having brought their army before CAPVA, they determined (if it might be) to win it by fiege. Wherefore Annibal being very fory for the fiege of CAPVA, he came with all his army against the enemy: & seeing shortly after that the Romanes did not refuse to fight, they both marched forward. And doutlesse to fight it would have proued a bloody battell, had not Sempronius army feuered them as he did, which came into CAMPANIA vnder the conduct of Cn. Cornelius, after E they had lost Sempronius Gracehus in the cotry of L v KE. For, they feeing this army farre of before they could know who they were, the ROMANES & CARTHAGINIANS both were affraied, & so retired into their campe. Afterwards the Consuls went into seuerall cotries, the one into

LVKE, and the other towards CVMES, to make Annibal remove from CAPVA: who went into L vc ANIA, & foud occasio to fight with M. Centenius, who very fondly & desperatly did hazard

vpon the campe of the ROMANES, having first willed the CAMPANTAN sat the selfe same in-Istant to make a falve out on the. The ROMANE Confuls at the first tumult of their enemies, deuided the army betwene them, and went against them. The CAMPANT AN swere easily driven againe into the citie: howbeit against Annibal, the battell was very bloudy. For if euer he proried him selfe a valiant Capraine or noble souldier, that day he shewed it. He attempted also to furprise the ROMANES by some stratageame. For as his men were about to breake into the Annibale stratage ROMANES campe, he fent one thither that had the Latine tongue excellently well, who cryed tageame. out, as by commaundement of the Confuls, that the Romans should faue them selues in the next Mountaines, confidering they had almost lost all their campe and strength. This crye B made on the fodaine, had easily moued them that heard it, if the ROMANES being throughly acquainted with Annibals futtelties, had not found out his deceit. Wherefore, one of them incoraging an other, they made the enemy retyre, and compelled him in despite of his beard to flie into his campe. When Annibal had done what he could by all deuile and practife possible to rayle their feege from CAPVA, and perceining all would not ferue, being fory for the daunger of his confederats: he then determined to call a counfell, the which he had paffed ouer a long time, having referued it for the last refuge. For he trussed up his cartage, and marched away with his army, and as quietly as he could he passed ouer the river of Vulturnus, and coa- Vulturnus fl fling through the contries of the SIDICINIANS, ATIFANIANS, and CASSINIANS, he came to Rome with enfignes displayed, hoping thereby he should make them rayle their seege, be-C ing so earnestly bent to winne CAPVA. This flying straight to ROME by currers, they were so affrayd there, as Romewas neuer in the like feare it stoode in then. For they saw their mortall enemy come to them with enfignes displayed, whome they had so often proued, almost to the vtter destruction of their Empire: and now they saw him present, whome they could not refift being absent, threatning to bring the Senate and people of Rome into subjection. So all Rome being in feare and tumult, it was orderned that Fuluim Flacem (one of the Confuls lying before CAPVA) should be sent for home. And that the new Confuls, Sulpicius Galba, and Sulpicius Cornelius Centimalus, shoulde lye in campe out of the citie: and that C. Calphurnius Prætor, nelius Centishould put a stronge garrison into the capitoll, and also that the Citizens that had borne any malus conoffice or dignitie, hould be appointed by their countenaunce and authoritie, to pacific the falls. D fodaine tumults that might happen in the city. So Annibal marched forward without staying, till he came to theriuer of Anienes, and there camped within 24. furlong of Rome: and thort- Anienes A. ly after that, he came with two thow and horse so neare vnto Rome, that riding from the gate Collina, vnto Hercules temple, he had leyfure to view at his pleasure, the situacion and walles of fo great a citie. Fuluius Flaceus feeing that, could not abide it, but straight sent outcerten methy inmen of armes of the Romanes against him: who comming with great furie to give charge "seds Rome. vpon him as they were commaunded, they eafily fent him packing. The next morning, Annibal brought his army out of the campe, and did fet them in battell raye, determining to fight presently, if he could allure the enemy to battell. The Romanes on the other fide did the like, So, both armies marched one against the other with such life and corage, that to see them, E they appeared men that feared no daunger, fo they might obteine the victorie that day. For on the one fide, the CARTHAGINIAN'S were to fight (in maner) for the Empire of the world: the which they thought depended upon this battell, as beeing the last they should fight. The ROMANES in contrary manner, they were to fight for their contry, libertie, and their goods, to fee whether they could keepe them, or that they should come to their enemies handes. How- A wonder. beit there fell out a thing worthy of memorie. For, as they were ready fet in battell raye, tarying but for the fignall of battell to give charge: there fell fuch a wonderfull great shower and storme vpon them, that both of them were driven in spight of their teethes, to bringe backe their army into their forts againe. The next day following in like manner, vnto the which it seemed the battel had bene deferred: when they had againe both of the fet their men in battel F raye, therefell the like storme vpon them, the which did as much hurt the Romanes & Car-THAGINIANS, as the first: so that it forced them onely to looke to sauethem selues, and not to thinke otherwise to fight, Annibal perceiving this, he turned to his friends and told them, that taken from him. So there was a thinge that greatly troubled Annibal, and that was this. That though he came fo neare to Rome, with an army of horsemen and sootemen; yet he heard that the ROMANE'S had fent ayde into SPAYNE, and that they had redeemed the contry where he had bene at a farre greater prife then reason required. Wherefore being in a rage withall, he caused all the goldsmithes and banckers shoppes of the Romane citizens to be sold by the Crver. But afterwards, casting with him selfe what a hard enterprise it was to take the citie of Rome, or els being affrayde to lacke vittells: (for he had stored him selse onely but for tenne dayes) he rayled his campe, and remouing thence, came to the holy woode of the goddeffe Feronia, and rifled the richetemple there, and afterwardes went thence into the contry of the BRYTIANS and LYCANIANS. The CAPVANS having intelligence thereof, being left out of all B hope: they yelded up their citie unto the Romanes. The citie of Carva beeing thus yelded vp, and brought againe to the subjection of the Romanes, it was of great importance to all the people of ITALY, and withall brought a great defire of chaunge. Annibal him felfe also following euill counsell, did spoyle and destroy many cities he could not keepe; whereby he did flurre vp the harts of divers nations against him. For where before when he was Conqueror, he had often let prisoners goe without ransom paying, through which liberalitie he had won the harts of many men: euen fo at that present time, his barbarous crueltie made divers cities (misliking to be subject to the CARTHAGINIANS) to rebell against him, and to take part with the ROMANES. Amongest them was SALAPIA, the which was yelded up vnto the Conful Marcellus, by Blacius meanes, chiefe of all the Romans faction; and a band also of choyce @ horsemen which was left there in garrison, were in manner slaine every man of them. This is the citie where Annibal fell in fancy with a gentlewoman, and therefore they greatly reproue where Anni. balfell in his immoderat lust and lasciuiousnes. How beit there are others, that greatly commending the continencie of this Captaine, fay that he did neuer eate lying, and neuer drancke aboue a pint of wine, nether when he came to make warre in ITALY, nor after that he returned into A-FRICK, Some there be also that fav, Annibal was cruell, and vnconstant, and subject to divers fuch other vices: how beit they make no manner of mention of his chaffitie or incontinencie. But they report that his wife was a Spanyard, borne in Casty Lo, a good towne: and that the CARTHAGINIANS graunted her many things and trusted her very much, bicause of the great faith and constancie of that nation. Now Annibal after he had lost (as we have told you) D the citie of SALAPIA: he found the meanes to cry quittance, and to make the ROMANES lofe more then he had loft. For at the felfe fame time, Fuluius Viceconful, lay befeeging of HER-DONE A hoping to winne the citie without refistance. And bicause he stoode in no seare of any enemy round about him, (for Annibal was gone into the contry of the BRYTIANS) he kept no watch, and was altogether negligent in martiall affayres, contrary to the nature of the Ro-MANE Captaines. Annibal being advertised thereof by spialls, would not lose such a goodly oportunitie: and therefore comming into APVLIA with his armye ready, he came so hastely VINTO HERDONEA, that he had almost stollen yoon Fuluius, ynprouided in his campe. Howbeit the Romanes valiantly received the first charge with such corage, that they sought it out lenger then it was looked for. Notwithstanding, in the ende, as the ROMANES two years be- E fore that had bene ouercome not farre from thence, with their Conful Fuluiss: even so like-

enemy that could nether be quiet Conquerer, nor conquered. So the battell was more bloudvand cruell then any that was before: bicause the Romanes did their best to be revenged C of their loffe , and the CARTHAGINIANS on the other fide were mad in their mindes, to fee that the vanquished durst prouoke the vanquishers vnto battell. In the ende, the Romanes being sharpely reproued, and also perswaded by Marcellus to sticke to it valliantly like men. that the newes of their victorie might come to Rome, before the newes of their ouerthrows: they flue in among the preffe of their enemies, and neuer left fighting, till that after they had thrife broken their enemies, they made them all flie. At the felfe same time Fabius Maximus tooke the citie of TARENTVM againe, almost after the selfe fame fort it was lost. This being reported vnto Annibal, he fayd: the Romanes have also their Annibal. The next yeare following, Marcellus and Crispinus were chosen Consuls, who preparing to put them selues in readines for warre, they led both the armies against the enemy. Annibal dispayring that he was not Constant able to refift them in battel, he fought all the wits he had to deuise some way to intrappe them by futtelrie, whome he could not ouercome by battel. So Annibals head being occupied thus, there was offred him a better occasion to bring this enterprise to passe, then he looked for Be- Anniballar twene both campes, there was a prety groue, in the which Annibal layed certen bands of the the state of the for the state. NYMIDIANS in ambushe, to intrappe the enemies passing to and fro . On the other side, the Confuls by confent of them all, thought it best to send to view this groue, and to keepe it if neede required : least in leaving it behind them, the enemies should come, & so be vpon their tacks afterwards. Now before they removed their armye, both the Confuls went out of their campe, with a small company of horsemen with them, to view the situacion of this place; and to going on very undiscreetely, and worse appoynted then became men of their authoritie & F. place, they vnfortunatly fell into Annibals amouth. So, when they faw them felues in a momet compassed about on enery side with enemies, that they could not goe forward, and were also fought withall behind: they defended them felues the best they could, rather by compulsion, then of any determination they had to fight. So Marcellus was flaine fighting valiantly: and The death of Crispinus the other Consul also very fore hurt, who hardly scaped the enemies hands. Annibal Marcellus, being aduertised that Marcellus was slaine, who was the chiefest man of all the Romann captaines, that had most hindered the happy successe of his victories, and had besides troubled him most: he presently went and camped there where the battell was fought, and when he had found Marcellus body, he gaue it honorable pompe and funerall. Hereby we may fee how The power of magnanimitie, and excellent vertues, are efteemed of all men: confidering that the cruell and magnanimu

A went into Apvilia, Marcellus also followed him foote by foote, and sought to put all to hasard by some notable battell: for he bare him selte thus in hand, that of all the ROMANS Captaines there was none machable with Annibal but him telfe, either in counfell, wit, or policiel; or els in martiall discipline, or warlike stratageames. Howbeit the winter following kept him, that he could not fight any fet battell with the enemie: for after he had made aftene light skimmis thes, bicaufe he would not trouble his fouldiers any more in vaine, he bestowed themin garrifon for the winter time. At the beginning of the next fixinge, procured partly by Fabius letters (who was one of the new Confuls for that yeare,) and partly also through his owne difposition : he brought out his garrisons sooner then they were looked for wand came with his army against Annibal, who lay ar that time at CANVSIVM. The third day, the Roman as to recover the shame and dishonor they had loft the day before: they were the first that prayed they might fight, and so Martellus led them out to battell, Amibal wondring at their valiantnes, sayd unto his people: that he delt with an Annibal

fenger came but newly vnto SALARIA, when letters were brought also from Apribal in the behalfe of Marcellus, to tell them that he woulde be there the next night . The SALAPIANS knowing his craft, they fent his Messenger away, & carefully looked for Annibals comming. About the fourth watche of the night, Annibal came to the citie of SALAPIA, who of purpole had out all the Romans that had fled in the vauntgard, bicause that they speaking the Latin tongue, might make them beleue that Marcellas was there in person. So when the Citizens had suffred fix hundred of them to come in, they shut to the gates, and with their shot and darts thrust out the rest of the armye, and then put all them to the sword they had let into the R citie. Thus Annibal beeing in a maruelous rage he had missed of his purpose: he remoued thence, and went into the contry of the BRYTIANS, to ayde the LOCRIANS that were before ged by the ROMANES, both by sea and by land. After all these thinges, at the carnest request of the Senate and people, two new Confuls were created, both famous Captaines, and valiant fouldiers, Marcus Linius, & Claudius Nero: who having devided the army betwixt them, went with, and t. Ners: Confuls votto their feuerall charge and proninces. Claudius Nero went into the contry of the SALENTI-NIANS, and M. Linius into GAVIE, against Hasdrubal BARCINIAN, who was come ouer the Alpes, & made hafte to joyne with his brother Annibal, bringing with him a great army both of footemen and horsemen. Nowe it chaunced at the same time, that Annibal had receyued great loffe by Claudius the Conful. For first of all he ouercame him in the contry of the Lyca- Q NIANS, vling the like policies and fetches that Annibal did. Afterwardes againe, meeting with Annibal in Apy LIA, by the citie of VENVSIA: he fought fuch a luftye battell with him, that many of his enemies lay by it in the fielde. By reason of these great losses, Annibal sodainely went to Met apont, to renew his army againe. So having remayined there a few dayes, he receiued the army from Hanno, the which he joyned vnto his, & then returned vnto VENVSIA. C. Nero lay not farre from V EN V SIA with his campe: who having intercepted letters of his enemies, he vinderstoode by them that Hasarubal was at hand with his armye. Thereuppon, he bethought him felfe night and day, what policie he might vie to preuent the joyning of two fo great armies together as these. So after he had taken aduise of him self, he followed in sight, a daungerous determination: but peraduenture necessary, as the time required. For leaving D the campe vnto the charge of his Lieuetenant, he tooke part of the armye with him, and making great iorneyes, came to Piceny M (being the marches of Ancona) fo that on the fixt Sena,a citie day he came to SENA. There both the Confuls iouned their forces together, and fetting vpon Hastrubal by the river of Metaurum, they had very good lucke at that battell. For as it is re-M.Luin, ported, there were fix and fifty thow fand of the enemies flayne on that daye: fo that they almost had as great an ouerthrow, as the Romanes had received before at the battell of Can-Haldrubal, & NES. Now Claudius Nero, after this famous victorie, returning as speedily vnto V BNVSIA as he went thence, he fet yp Hasdrubals head, where the enemies kept their watche: and did let certen prisoners goe, to carrye newes to Annibal of this great ouerthrow. For afterwardes it was knowen, that Annibal knew nothing yet of Claudius fecret enterprise, nor of the speedy execution and greatflaughter he had made. VV hereat fure I can but wonder, that so futtill a Captaine as Annibal, could be deceived by Claudius, confidering both their campes lay so neare together: fo that he first heard the newes of the ouerthrow of his brother, and all his armye, before he ynderstoode any thing of the Consuls departure, or heard of his returne againe to the campe. Now Annibal having not onely received a generall, but also a perticular great losse by the death of his brother: he layd then he plainely faw the chaunge & alteracion of the CAR-

Since that time, I ban findoin no Grakenot rell Minibal Larun Author, that Annibal did any famous acte in Iralia worthylmemorie. For betting feet was and for into Arricke by the Carthaginians, he left I main, fixteend year chafter this A Price Sempronius, warre was begonne, greatly complaying of the Scharchar Charles than of him Jelfe allo, he were much Of the Senate, bicaufe that all the time he had benein his enemies control long, shey had Amibal. allowed him fo litle money : and to fcanted him befides with all other thinges negeriary for Annibal fent allowed film to intermorey; and an active min believes with an occupie the Monarias, be for to reining the warres; And of him felle; bleaufethat after hehad to often ouercome the Romanias, be into Africk, had alwayes delayed time after the victorie, and had given the ending libertie to gather force after he had againe. It is reported also, that before he imbarked and tooke sea, he tervo a triumphing arche wared 16. C or piller, by the temple of Iuno Lacinia, in the which were briefly granen his poblevictories, tab. both in the Punick and Græke tongue. So when he was departed out of Ir ALE, the wind fer- Annibals ued him well, that in few dayes he arrived at LEPT 13, and landing all his army, he first came to arche of nie A DRVMENTYM, and afterwards vnto ZAMA. There receiving advertisement how the affayres Annihal deof the CARTHAG INTANS prospered : he thought it best to deuise some way to end this warre; parteth out of For this cause he sent vnto Scipio, to pray him to appoynthim some concenient place where they might both meete, and talke together, of matters of great importance. Now it is not certainely knowen, whether Annibal did this of his owne head, or by commaundement from the Senate. Scipio refuled notto come to parley. Wherefore at the day appropried theremet two Annibal and famous generalls of mighty nations, in a great plaine together, either of them having his In-D terpreter, to talke together of divers matters touching peace and warre. For Applicativas also together bent to peace: bicause he saw the affayres of the C ARTHING INTANS WAXEWOFSE & worfe enery day: that they had loft Sicilia, SARDINIA, and Sparing: bicaufe the warre was brought out of ITALY into AFRICK: bicaufe Syphax (a mightyking) was taken prifoned of the ROMANES: and also bicause that their last hope consisted in the army he had brought into A FRICK: which was the onely remayne and reliefe of folong a warre as he had made in ITALY: and also bicause that the CARTHAGINIANS had so small a powdriest (both of straungers, and also of Citizens) that there were scarse men enough to desende the citie of CARTHAGE. So he did his best to perswade Scipio, with a long oration he made, rather to as gree to peace, then to refolue of warre. How beit Scipio that lived in hope to bringe this warre E to a good ende, he would not seeme to give eare to any peace. Wherefore after they had long debated the matter of either fide, in the enderthey brake of, and made no agreement. Shortly after, was this famous battell striken by the citic of ZAMA, in the which the ROMAN BEODERY'S Scipice vined victorie. For first of all, they made the CARTHAGINIANS Elephants turne upon their Carthaginiownearmy, to that they did put all Annibals horsemen out of order. And Lalius and Masinissa am a the who made both the winges, increasing their feare, gaue the horsemen no leysures gather banell of Zathem selues in order againe. Howbeit the sootemen sought it out a long time, & with a mare ries) thought that all the fafeticand preservation of A PRICK, was all in their handes and therefore they layed about them like men. The ROMANBS on the other fide had as great harts E as they, and besides, they stoode in the better hope. Howbeit one thing in deede did the Rosi harts were done, and they faw no other remedie for them, but to hope to feare by flying Stoie is reported that there were flayne that day, aboue twenty showland CARYHAGIN ANNIAN the field, and as many more prisoners, stimebal their generally after he had ravved to see the ende The firms of of the battell, fled with a few of his men out of the great flaughter. Afterwardes when he was fent for to CARTHAGE, to helpe to faur his contry: he perswaded the Senare not to hope an ny more in warres, burdid counfell them, that fetting all deniles a part, they should fend wate Score the Romana Captaine, to make peace with him upon any condiction. When the remain Ambaffadors had brought the capitulation and agreement vnto Cananas of the articles of peaces it is reported that there was one Gifgo, who milliking to heare talke of peaces he made an oration, and perfwaded all he could to renew warre against the Romanus, Where H fore Annibal perceiping that divers men confirmed his opinion, and being much offended to fee fuch beafts, and men of no understanding, to dare to speake of such matters in so daungerous a time: he cast him downe headlong, whilest he was yet in his oration. So when he sawe that the Citizens, and all the whole affembly, thought this too prefumptuous a part of him, & vnmeete altogether for a free citie: he him felfe got vp into the pulpit for orations, and fayd. Let no man be offended if a man that from his youth hath bene alway out of CARTHAGE. & brought vp all his life time in warres, be ignoraunt of the lawes and ordinaunces of the citie. After that he spake so wisely to the articles of peace, that the CARTHAGINTANS being immediatly moved by the authoritie of fo great a person: they all agreed to accept the condicions which the vanquisher, & the necessitie of time offred them. The articles out of dout werevery extreame, and fuch as the vanquished are wont to receive with all extreamitie by the conquerors. But belides all other things, the CARTHAGINTANS were boud to pay the ROMANES an annuell tribute. vntill a certen time were ronne out. So when the daye came that the first pencion was to be payd to the Romanes, and that every man grudged when the subsedy was spoken of fome save that Annibal being offended with the vaine teares of the CARTHAGE NIANS, he fell a laughing. And when Haldrubal Hadge reproued him bicause he laughed in fuch a common calamitie of all the citie, he aunswered: that it was no laughture nor rejoycing from the hart, but a fcorning of their fond teares, that wept when there was leffe cause (and onely bicause it touched every private mans purse) then before, when the ROMANES tooke from the CARTHAGINIAN'S their shippes, armor, and weapons, and their spoyles of D the great victories which they had wonne before, and now gaue lawes and ordinaunces vnto them that were vanquished. I know some Authors write that Annibal immediately after he had loft the battell, fled into A s 1 A, for that he was affrayde they woulde deliuer him into Scipioes hands, that perhaps might demaund him of them. But whether that was done fodainely, or former time after the battel was loft at Z A M A, it makes no great matter: confidering that all the world knoweth, that when he fawe things brought to extremitie, he presently fled into As IA vnto king Antiochus. So is it most true, that king Antiochus receiued him with great curtesie. and vied him very honorably: infomuch as he made him of counfell with him all in all, both in private and publike causes. For the name of Annibal caried great reputation with all men: belides that, he had a common and mortal hate to the Romanes, which was a pricking spurre E. ftill to moue warre against them. And therefore it seemeth that he came in happy hower into that contry, not onely to pricke forward the courage of the king against them, but also to set warres at libertie against the ROMANES. So he tolde him, that the onely way to make warre. with the ROMANES, was to goe into ITALY to leavy ITALYAN fouldiers, by whome onely, that victorious contry of all other nations might be subdued. He requested of the king a hundred (hippes, fixteene thow fand footemen, and a thow fand horfemen onely, With this smallarmy he promifed to inuade I TALYANS. whome he knew yet to stand in no small feare of him, for the very found of his name onely: bicause of the late warres he had made there, so freshe yet in memorie. Furthermore, he tooke hart againe vnto him to renew the warres of A FRICK, if the king would licence him to fende. g. men vnto CARTHAGE, to stirre vp the BARCINIAN faction, whome he knew hated the Rom ANBS to death. When he had gotten the king to graunt him his request, he called Ariston TYRIAN

ANNIBAL. A Tyrian vinto him, a fine futtell fellowe, and meete for fuch a purpose: to whome he made large promises, and perswaded him to goe to CARTHAGE to his friends, and to cary them letters from him. Thus Annibal being a banished man, and fled out of his contry, rayled warre in all partes against the Romanes. And surely his counsell had taken good effect, had king Antiochus rather followed his aduise, as he did at the first, then the vaine perswasions of his fine Courtiers. But enuy, a common plague frequenting Princes Courts, bred Annibal great ene- Empythe camies. For they beeing affrayd that by his counfells he should growe in great fauor with the manplague king, (for he was a wife and politike Captaine) and that thereby he should beare great sway Princes and authoritie: to preuent it, they lacked no deuiseto bringe him in disgrace with the king, Comite, And it so chaunced at that time, that P. Villius, who came Ambassador vnto Ephesys, he

B had often conference with Annibal. Hereuppon his prinie enemies tooke occasion to accuse him, and withall, the king him selfe became so ielous of it, that from thence forth he neuer more called him to counsell . At the selfe same time also, as some doe report, P. Corne- Scipio Affilius Scipio African (who was one of the Ambassadors sent vnto king Antiochus) talking sa-con met with millierly with Annibal, prayed him amongest other thinges to tell him truely, whome he Epholia, thought the worthiest Captaine of all others . Annibal aunswered him . First he thought Annibals Alexander, king of Mace Don the chiefest: next vnto him, Pyrrhus king of the Epirotes: independing for and thirdly, him felfe. Then Scipio A FRICAN fmyling, asked him: what wouldeft thou fave, mous Cap-Annibal.if thou haddest ouercome me? Truely sayd he, then I would be chiefest my selfe. This winter aunswer pleased Scipio maruelous well, bicause he saw he was nether dispised, nor yet brought

C to be compared with the other, but lest alone as peereles, by some secret flattery of Annibal. After these things, Annibal found occasion to talke with king Antiochus, and beganne to lay oven his life vnto him from his youth, and to bewray the malice he had alwayes borne vnto the ROMANES: whereby he so satisfied the king, that he was againe received into his grace and fauor, which he had almost veterly lost. Thereuppon the king was determined to have made him Admirall of his armye by fea, the which he had put in readines for I TALY, and alfo to make proofe of his great corage and feruice, whome he knewe to be a worthy man, and a mortall enemy to the ROMANES. But one Thous, Prince of the ETOLIANS, thwarting this opinion, either for malice, or els for that his fancye was fuch: he altered the kinges minde, and cleane changed his purpose, the which was a matter of greate importance for the warre he n pretended to make. For he gaue counsell vnto Antiochus, that he should goe him selfe into GRECE, and direct his owne affayres: and that he should not suffer another to cary away the honor & glory of this warre. So king Antiochus fhortly after went into GRACE to makewarre with the Romanes. Within fewe dayes after, when he confulted whether he shoulde make league with the THESSALIANS, Annibals opinio was specially asked: who spake so wisely touching the state of the THESSALIANS, & the chiefest matter of importance, that they all went with his opinion, and gaue their consents vnto it. Now his opinion was, that they should not neede much to care for the THESSALIANS, but rather to make all the meanes they could, to get king Philip of MACEDON to take their part: or els to perswade him to be a Newter, and to take nether parte. Furthermore, he gaue counfell to make warre with the Romanes in their Annibal coll. E owne contry, & offred him felfe to ayde him the best he could. Euery man gaue good eare to fullath king his words, but his opinion was rather comended, then followed, Wherefore euery man mar-make ware uelled, that such a Captaine as he, that had so many yeares made warre with the ROMANES with the Ho-(who had in manner coquered all the world)(hould then be fo light fet by of the king, when it manes frecially stood him vpon, to have such a mans help & cousel. For, what captaine living could a man haue foud more skilful or politike, or meter to make war with the Romanes, then him? Howbeitthe king made no reckoning of him, at the first beginning of this warre: but shortly after, distaining al their consell, he cofessed that Annibal only saw what was to be done. For af King Antiter the Romanes had obtained victory in the war he made in GR & CB: Antiochus fled out of chui indge-them. But Annibal, who knewe the power and ambition of the Romanes, perswaded the king A to hope for any thing rather then peace, and bad him trust to it, that the Romanes would neuer stay, till they had proued whether they could enlarge the dominions of their Empire, into the third part of the world, as they had done in Africk, and Evrope. Antiochus perswaded by the authority of fuch a man, straight commaunded Polyxenidas, a very serviceable man, and skilfull in fea feruice, that he should goe meete with the army of the Romanes that was comming thither. Then he fent Annibal into Syria, to leavy a great number of thippes together, and afterwards made him, and Apollonius, (one of his fauored Courtiers) generalls of this arrive by fea: who notwithstanding that Polyxenidas was put to the worst by the Ro-MANES, they went and fet vpon the RHODIANS, that were confederats with them. Annibal in this harrell affavling Eudamus the Captaine of the R HODIANS, that led the left wing: he had R already compassed in the Admirall galley, and doubtles had obtayned the victorie, but that the other wing came in to rescue, after they had followed Apollonius in chase, and tooke the victorie from him, that was his owne. After this battell by fea, which had no great good fucceffe: we doe not find that Annibal did any thing worthy memorie. For king Antiochus being ouercome, besides other condicions, the Romanes offred him: they desired that Annibal (the mortall enemy of their contry) should be deliuered vnto them. Annibal foreseeing this long before, he fodginely stale from Antiochus, after this notable battell that was fought by MAGNESIA, where the kings power was ouerthrowen. So, after Annibal had wandred vo and downe a long time, he fled at length vnto Prusias, king of BITHYNIA, for succor. Nowe he did not so much trust to his friendshippe, but bicause he sought for the meetest place he coulde C come by as also for the safest, the which he most defired: considering that the ROMANES had the most part of the sea and land in their subjection. Some say, that after king Antiochus was Ouercome, Annibal went into CRETA vnto the GORTYNIANS: and that the rumor ranne immediatly, he had brought a great maffe of gold and filuer with him. Wherefore being affrayd least the CRETAN'S should offer him some violence, he deuised this shifte to scape the daunger, he filled earthen pots with lead, gilt, and fent them into the temple of Diana, fayning that he was maruelous carefull for them, as though all his treasure had bene there. On the other fide he had hid all his gold in images of braffe, the which he had left carefly lying on the ground in the house. In the meane time, whilest they watched the temple carefully, that these earthen pots should not be caried away without their privitie: Annibal hoysed sayle, and fled into B1- D THYNIA. In BITHYNIA there is a village vpon the feafide, which the contry men call LIBY ssa, of the which by fome mens faying, there ranne an olde oracle and prophecy in this fort. The land of Liby (a shall couer under movulde

There Annibal lay, not spending his time idely, but passing it away in exercising of the maryners, riding of horses, and trayning of his souldiers. Some Authors also do write, that at that Apribal, king time Prulias made warre with Eumenes, king of Pergany M, who was a confederate and friend of the ROMANES: and that he made Annibal his Lieuetenant generall of his army by fea: who affayling Eumenes with a new found and ynknowen deuife, wanne the victory of the battell by fea. For before they began to fight, it is reported that Annibal had gotten an infinite number F of snakes into earthen pots, and when the battell was begonne, and they busily tending their fight: he threw those pots with makes into the enemies shippes, and that by this fearefull and ffraunge deuise he made them flie. Now whether this was true or not, the olde chronicles do make no manner of mention, but onely AEmylius and Trogus. And therefore I report me to the Authors. So, the newes of the diffention betwixt these two kings, (Prusias, and Eumenes) being brought to Rome: the Senate fent T.Q. Flaminius Ambassador into As ra, whose name was famous for the noble victories he had obtayned in GRECE, to the ende (as I coniecture) to make peace betwixt these two kings. Flaminius being come vnto king Prusias, he was maruelously offended, and fory in his mind to fee Annibal yet aliue, (that was the mortallest enemy of the Romanes) after the coquests of so many nations, & the facking of so many people: in therfore, he was very earnestly in hand with king Prusias, to deliuer him Annibal Annibal from the first beginning mistrusted king Prusias inconstancye very much, and therefore had digged

A divers vaults in his house, and made seven severall vents to flie out at, if he were sodainely taken. The report of Flaminius coming did encrease his suspition the more, for that he thought him the greatest enemy he had in Rome: both generally for the hate he bare vnto all the Ro-MANE s, as also perticularly for the remembraunce of his father Flaminius, that was flayne in the battell fought by the lake of Thrafymene. So Annibal being full of care and griefe (as it is reported) he found deuises to escape, the which stood him to no purpose against such a great power. For when the kings gard which were fent to take him, had copassed his house about Annibal thought to flie at their first comming, and to faue him selfe by the secretest vault he had. But when he found that the place was kept by the gard, then he determined to rid him felfe out of the Romanes handes, by destroying him selfe. So, some doe report, that he was B strangled by one of his men, whome he had commanded to helpe to dispatche him. Others write againe, that he had droncke bulles bloud, and when he had droncke it, dyed, as Clitarchin, and Stratocles doe fallely report of Themistocles . Howbeit Tieus Linius, that famous Hifloriographer writeth, that Annibal called for the poyfon he had ready for fuch a mischiefe. and that holding this deadly drinke in his hand, before he dranke he fayd: Come on, let vs rid the Romanes of this payne and care, fith their spight and malice is so great, to hasten the death of a poore old man that is halfe dead already. The auncient Romanas aduertifed Pyrrhu king of the Epirotes, who came with enseignes displayed to the very walls of the citie of Rome, that he should looke to him selfe, and beware of poyloning : and these Romanes nowe doe make a friende forgetting his kingly state and faithfull promise, vilely to betraye his C poore ghest. After he had sayd, bitterly curfing king Profias, he poysoned him selfe, being three Annibal pops force & tenne yeare olde, as fome writers doe telfine. His body was buried in a tombe of frone force by LEYS SA, on the which was ingrauen no more but this: Here lyeth Annibal. The ROMANES 707 care old. h beeing adderrised of his death, every man sayde his opinion, as his sancye served him. Some timbe by the greatly blamed T.Q. Flaminius crueltic, who to make him felfe famous by some notable acte, with (as he thought) made a poote olde man put him felfe to death, that was in manner half dead by age, and befides, was past doing the state of Rome any more hurt, they being Conquerors in manner of all the world. But some againe on the other fide, commended Flaminius for it, & favd it was a good deede of him, to rid the Ro MANE sof their mortall enemye : who though he had but a weake body, yet he lacked no wit; wife counfell, and great experience in warres, D to intife king Prusias to make warre, and to molest all Assabesides with new ewarres. For at that time the power of the king of BITHENIA was forgreat, that it was not to be lightly regarded For after that, Mithridates king of the fame BITHENTA, did marnelously molest the Ro-MANES both by sea and by land, & moreouer fought battells with L. Lucullus, and Cn. Pompey, famous Captaines of the ROMANES: And fo the ROMANES might alfobe affrayd of king Pruflas, and specially having Annibal his Captaine. So some judge, that Q. Plaminius was specially feur Amballador vnto king Prulias, feeretly to practife Annibals death. Howbeit it is to be fupposed, that Q. Flaminius was not so desirous to haue Annibal so sodainely put to death, as he would have bene glad otherwise to have brought him againe to Rome, that had done such mischiefe to his contry and this had bene a great benefit for Rome, and much honor also yn-E to him felfe. THE LIFE OF Scipio African.

White Scipio a PATRICIAN, of the familye of the Cornely, who was the A first Romane Captaine against whome Annibal fought in I rat y:was the father of Cornelius Scipia afterwards fornamed AFRICAN the first lo called, bicanfe he had conquered that fiation . The fame Scipio, af-Iter he had obtained many great victories in Spayne, and done notable feates of armes; was in the ende flayne with a wound he had in a battell against his enemies, as he was plying and incoraging of his men from place to place, thronging in the greatest daunger and fury of the battell. Shorely after did his brother Chi Scipio also ende his life, much after one selfe manner, and was flavne valliantly fighting. So these two Captaines, befides the fame they achieved by their noble deedes left behind them great prayle of their B faithfulnes, modeltie, and corage: the which made them not onely withed for of their fouldiers that were then living, but also of all the SPANYARD's besides. Cn. Scipio had a forme called P. Cornelius Nafica, one that had bene Conful and had also triumphed; who beging but a younge man, was thought the meetest man of all the citie of Rome to recevue ware the mother of the goddes. This Publius had two formes, the fortamous Scipioes tof the whigh the one was called Asian, bicanie he conquered Asia: and the other Aerican, bicanie he subdued A FRICK at that famous battell of ZAMA, where he overthrewe Annibal and the Colors AGG H NIANS, as we fayd before. Whose life we purpose nowe to write, not so much to make the glory of his name (lofamous by all the Græke & Laryn Authors) the greater by our history; as for that we would make all men know the order of his noble deeds & moral vertues so thend C that all Princes & noble Captaines in reading it should behold the lively image of perfit vertue, which may move an earnest desire in the to follow the example of P. Cornelius Scipioes life, who from his childhod gaue greathone & shew of a noble nature, & excellent vertue, after he followed the instruction of martiall discipline, under the conduct of his father. He was caried into the field at the beginning of the fecond watte with the CARTHAGINIANS, followed the campe being but seuenteene yeare old; & in a very short time grew so toward, & forward in al P. Con Scipio, things, in riding, in watching, in taking all maner of paynes like a foldier, that he wan great comendacion of his own father, & befides, great estimation also of all the army. Furthermore, he shewed such tokens of a sharp wit, & noble corage: that it made him beloued, & also seared of

A his enemies. For this Scipio was present at the battell of the horsemen, where P. Cornelitu Scipio the Conful fought with Annibal, by the river of Thefin: & some writers doe affirme that Cor. P. Septent nelius the father being hurt, was almost taken by the enemye, had not his fonne Stipio faued the from bee him, who had then but a litle downe on his beard, he was to young. After that alfo, at the bate ing taken of tel that was fought by CANNES, to the great loffe, & in maner vtter destruction of the Empire! the encuien of Rome, when the ten thowfand men that fled to CANVS IVM, had all together with one cofent referred the gouernment of the army vnto Appius Pulcher, that had bene Ædilis, and vnto Cornelius Scipio, that was yet but very young: the fame Scipio shewed then by his deedes, what noble mind and corage was in him. For when he faw certen young men conful together betwene them selues to forsake ITAL whe thrust in among them, & drawing out his sword, made B them all sweare they would not for sake their contry. These, and such like deedes done by him with a liuely corage & noble mind, being then but a young man: wanne him fuch fauor with the ROMANES, that not respecting his young yeares, nor their auncient custo, they called him forward, & laid offices of great charge & gouernment vpon him. Insomuch that when he fued for the office of Ædilis before his due time, notwith franding that the Tribunes of the peo- ing but a ple were against his sute, bicause he was so younge a man: yet the people suffered him to be young man. brought from tribe to tribe, & fo was presently chosen Ædilis with the most voyces. So after his father & Vncle, (both famous and noble Captaines) had bene flaine one after the other in SPAYNE, & that the Romanes were in confultacion to appoint some worthy captaine in the roome: they could finde no man that durft vndertake this fo daungerous warre, confidering C the losse of two fo great captaines before. Wherfore the whole assebly being called to choose a Viceconful, all the other Princes & peeres of the Realme being filent at fo worthy a motion Scipio onely of all the rest, being but source & twenty yeare old, stoode vp in the middest of the, & faid, with a good hope & confidence he would willingly take the charge vpon him. He had seipio Pleeno sooner offred this promise, but he was presently made Viceconsul of Spay NE, with the Wo- conful at 24. derful good wil & fauor of the people, who gaue him all their voyces. Howbeit the Senators afterwards confidering better of the matter, against what captaines & natios he should make warre: they thought it vnpossible so younge a man coulde performe so waightye a charge, Wherefore mens minds were wonderfully chaunged againe on the sodeine, as if the mibes of the people had repented them of their voices & election. Seipio perceining it; called an affem. D bly presently, & made such an oration of his age, and discipline of warres, that every manufact goodly perform heard him wondred at him, & the people began againe to renew the good hope they had of negehim for the warres. For he had not only anoble corage in him, beeing indued with many finguler vertues, but he was also a goodly gentleman, & very comly of person, and had besides a pleasaunt countenaunce: all which things together, are great meanes to winne him the love and good will of euery man. Moreouer, euen in his gesture and behauior, there was a certaine princely grace. Now, the glory of martiall discipline, being joyned vnto those his rare gifts of mind and nature: it was to be doubted, whether his civil vertues made him more acceptable vnto straungers, then wonderful for his skil in warres. Furthermore, he had filled the common peoples harts with a certen superstitious feare, bicause he did daily (after he had take the mans E gowne) vie to goe vp to the Capitoll, & fo into the church without any company; infomutch that all men began to thinke that he learned some secret thinges in the temple, which others might not know, as they were perswaded long before, that Numa Pompilius was taught by the Nymphe AEgeria. Furthermore, it seemeth that some had the like opinion of Scipio, as in olde time they had of Alexander king of MACEDON, to wete: that oftentimes there was a shake feene in his mothers chamber. But let thefe things go. Scipio departing out of ITALY with ten Scipios inthowfand footemen, & a fleete of thirty gallies, every one of the having flue owers to a bank in into he failed into Spayne, & in few dayes arriving at Emporia, he landed his men, and marched by land to TARRA CON. There he kept a counfell, and many Ambassadors of the cities their

remnant of both armies, relifted (beyond all hope of man) the enemies puffed vp with glory of the victorie they had gotten, and with great valiantnes, and vnfpeakeable industry he mainterned warre in Spayne, against three Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, Now Scipio being comen to this army that lay in garrison for the winter time, euery man did certainly perswade them selues that the warre should prosper: and when they sawe him, they remembred their old Captaines, infomuch that there was neuer a fouldier could have his fill, with looking vpon this young man. Howbeit, after he had commended the fouldiers for their noble corage, not dispayring for the calamitie of their contry: he greatly honored Lucius Martius, to shewe. that who fo trusteth in his owne vertues, neede not enuy the glory of another man. So winter R being past, he tooke the old and newe bands out of the garrisons, and first of all determined to goe and lay fiege vnto new CARTHAGE. For of all the cities of SPAYNE it was the wealthieft, and none more meeter to make warre both by sea & land, then that. Moreouer, the captaines of the CART HAGINIANS had bestowed in this citie all their munition, and greatest treasure: and left a strong garrison, both in the citie, and castel. But the Captaines them selves were deuided in divers contries, to the end that they three might kepe the whole region from spoile, least of all looking then that CARTHAGE should be beleeged. So Scipio having put all in readines, he came to befeege new C ARTHAGE with all his army both by fea and land. This femed to be a maruelous hard enterprise, and would continue long, both bicause the citie was very geth new Carftrong of it felfe, and also for that the men within it were so coragious: that they did not one- C ly thinke them selues able to defend the citie, but their harts serued them also to make salves out vpon the enemie, and to skirmish with them, even to the very trenches of the ROMANES campe. Howbeight happeneth often, that what a man can not attaine by force, he may winne by industrie. Now Scipto knew, that the lake or mer which is not farre from the walls of CAR-THAGE, did ebbe and flowe with the tyde, and that it was passable by forde on that side where they might easiliest come to the walles: So, he thinking to imbrace this occasion, and that he could not possibly meete with a better denise to take CAR THAGE: when he saw his time he set his menin battell ray, and having deuided them into feuerall foundrons, gaue a more desperat affault vnto the citie, then he had done before. In the meane time, he chose out a band of the valiantest men he had, and commaunded them to wade ouer the lake, and to scale the walles D on that fide, where they within the towne made least accompt of it. So, these fouldiers that were commaunded to give this attempt, after they had passed ouer the lake without any let or trouble: they found that part of the wall without any watche or garde, bicause the greatest fury of the fight, was on the other fide of the citie. Therefore they eafily getting up on the wal, came and affayled the enemies behind them. The citizens, and those of the garrison, percevuing they were vnwares fallen into that great daunger: they immediatly for looke the walles, and feeing them felues charged on every fide, betooke them to their legges, and fled. The Ro-MANES purfued them fo hottely, that they wanne the citie, and facked it: where they found a wonderfull great spoyle, and aboundance of all things necessary for warre. Scipio greatly praysed his souldiers, & did reward them, for that they had done so valiant seruice. Howbeit when F. he should come to give the scaling crowne of the wals, vnto the first man that got vp vpon the wall: there were two fouldiers at fuch variance for the matter, that all the army was in daunger of division and mutinie vpon that occasion. Thereuppon Scipio called his men together, and in open affembly told them, that he knewe they both got vp on the wall together, and fo gauethem both a scaling crowne : & by this meanes their tumult was presently pacified. Afterwards he fent vnto all the cities of SPAYNE, the hostages that were found in the city, which were a maruelous number: the which wanne him great fame for his curtefie and clemency. whereby he allured many nations to yeld them felues vnto the ROMANES, and to forfake the CARTHAGINIANS. But one thinge about all the rest, chiefly increased his prayse, and wanne him great loue and good will, as a myrror and example of all vertue. There was a young Lady p

For the ende of warre is victorie: the benefit where of confishinh bountie, and clemencie. From thence commeth the glorie and all other praises due to Captaines: as it happened in those things whereof we now treate. For a great humber of Spany-ARD's being present, wondering at the great clemencie of the Generall of the Roman's sithey coulde doe no leffe but call him king, to honor and recompence his vertue. But Sciplo frake Sciplo called that word dead straight, the which was no common found to the Roman exerces, and there done, by the fore he would by no meanes allow that title, which he knewe to be hatefull to the noble men spannade. of his contrie, and also vnmeete for the libertie of the Romanes. He onely prayed the Spathen they would be faithfull and louing to the people of Rome. So whileft there things were done by Scipio, the other two Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, (Mago, and Hafaribal, the fonne of Gifgo)after they understoode of the ouerthrows of their men by the river of Bellila: they made all the speede they could to soyne together, and shortly after came and mer with Hafdrubal BARCINIAN, to confult together, and to take order for the warre. Luceius not forgetting his noble curtefie vnto her, did let all his subjects vnderstand the great bounty, modestie, and rare excellencie of all kinde of vertues that were in this Romans Generall: and shortly after he returned agains to the ROMANBS campe, with a great number of horsemen. Indibilia) vnderstanding where Hasdrubal BARCINIAN lay: he marched towards him with his armie, to fight with him, before Mago and the other Hasdrubal came to joyne with him, Hasdrubal BARCINIAN lay in campe by the river of Befula, & was verie defirous to fight, trufting Befula ft. wholly to his strength and army. But when he heard that Scipio was at hand, he left the valley, and got to a hill of pretie strength. The ROMANE legions followed him, and gaue him no respit, but pursued so neere, that they came and affaulted his campe at their first comming. So they fought it out voon the trenches and rampers, as if they had bene at the affault of a citie, The CARTHAGINIANS trusting to the strength of the place, and driven vnto it of necessities. (the which maketh cowards most desperat) they valliantly resisted their enemies the best they C could. The ROMANES in contrarie maner, being valliant, and full of good hope, fought it out lustely like men, and the fight was so muche more cruell, for that it was in the fight of their Generall Scipio, and of all the armie belides: infomuch that their valliant fertice there could not be hidden. Therefore they never gave over the affault, vntill that having done their vttermost endeuor, they got vp vpon the rampers, and entred in divers places into the enemies campe, and made them flie. Hafdrubal, Captaine of the CARTHAGINIANS, faued him felfe by flying, with a few with him, before the ROMANES entred into their fort. After this battell, Scipio according to his maner, caused all the spanish prisoners to be brought before him, and Scipios libe. When Haldrabal was gone into Tra-LIB, Hanno was fent from CARTHAGE in his place. But practifing in his forney to makethe CELTIBERIANS to rebell, M. Syllanus came and fer upon him by Scipioes commandement, and was so fortunate, that he ouercame him in battell, and tooke him prisoner. Nowe there A was a citie which the contrie men called O RINGE, the which was verie wealthie, and meete to renewe the warre. Lucius Scipio was fent thither with parte of the armie to befiege it : but finding it a verie strong scituacion, and too well manned to take it at the first assault, he enuironned the towne, and within few dayes tooke and facked it. Winter came on a pace, and the bened, and time of the yeare made them both to retire into their garrifos, for the winter. So Scipio having take priform. had so good fortune in this warre, he went vnto TARRACON: Mago, and the other Hasdrubal, the sonne of Gifgo, went to the sea side. The next sommer, warres growing more bloody and cruell then before in the lower Spayne, the Romanes and Carthag inians met, and joyned battell by the river of Befula, and fought fet battells. After they had fought a long time together. Scipio at length got the victorie, & made the enemies flie: (of the which there were B flaine a great number in the field) and geuing them no leasure to gather together againe, and to make head against him, he fought with them, and followed the chase so hottely, that Hasdrubal and Mago were driven to leave the maine land, and to flie to GADE s, after they had loft all their armie. In the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS, there was a young man of a noble corage, and verie wife, called Masinissa, who finding meanes to have secret conference with Syllanus, he was the first man that offred him frendshippe, either being brought to it through Scipioes liberalitie, or else bicause he thought the time was come, that it was the surest way to take part with the Romanes, which were the conquerors. It is that Masinissa that afterwards, (through the goodnes of the Romanes) became the great and mighty king of N VMIDIA. and in deede he was divers wayes a profitable frende vnto the Romanes. Furthermore, the felfe C. fame yeare, (which was the fourteenth of the seconde warre with the Africans) Spayne was the first nation and people of the vpland men dwelling in the hart of the realme, that was conquered vnder the happie conduct of the Viceconful Scipio: howbeit it was the last realme that was made a province long time after, by Augustus Cafar. Now Scipio not contenting him felf with the great victories he had obteined in verie short time in Spayne (for he had an imagination & good hope also to coquer A FRICKE) he thought that his best way, to make all the meanes he could possible to get Syphax, king of the MASESYLIANS, a frend to the ROMANES. Wherefore after he had felt the kinges minde, perceiuing that he was well inclined to make league with the ROMANES: he presently set all his other affaires aside, and sailed into AFRIKE with two gallies onely, at fine owers to a bancke. At the felfe fame time also came Hasdrubal, D the some of Gifgo thither, from GADE s: so that both these valliant & lusty Captaines came of purpose to the king, enuying one the other, to craue the kinges good will, vnto their contrie and common wealth. Syphax welcomed them both into his Court, and did vie them verie honorably and curteouslie, and appointed that they should both eate at one table, and lye in one felfe chamber, bicaufe the one shoulde not thinke his enterteinment better then the other, It is reported, that Haldrubal wondering at the magnanimity and great wifedom of Seipio that was present, he considered with him selfe the great daunger the citie of CARTHAGE and all AFRIKE besides was in through that mans meanes: for he saw him yet a young man, quicke, and excellent in all manner of great vertues, and that had continuallie obtained fuch victories, and therefore confidering the luftie youth of this gentleman, he imagined that it was ynpossible to perswade him to imbrace peace, rather then warre. Besides, he was affraied also that Syphax, moved by the personage and authoritie of him that was present, would take parte with the ROMANES: and in deede his minde gaue him rightlie, for so it happened. For though Syphax at the first shewed him selfe indifferent to them both, and had moved talke to end the warre between the Romanes and the Carthaginians: yet afterwards when Scipio tolde him he coulde conclude no peace without confent of the Senate of Rome, he rejected Stehax, king Hafdrubal, and inclining to Scipioes request, he made league with the people of Rome. So Sciof the Mar- pio being returned againe into SPAYNE, him felfe partely by force, and partely also by L. Martius meanes, conquered ILITYRGIVM, CASTVLO, and certaine other places that refused to the Romanes, yeeld them selves ynto the Romanes. And to the end nothing should be lacking for all kinde

SCIPIO AFRICAN. 1341 A great pompe, where there were many great estates, not only to see that passime, but also they them selues to handle the weapons in person. But amongest other Spanyardes of noble houses, there were two called, Corbis, & Orfais, which were at strife together for the kingdom; The on first but that day they ended their quarrell, the one being flaine by the others hand. The fight was mar fight of verie lamentable & grieuous to the beholders: but the death of him that was flaine, troubled germant. them much more, for they were both coufin germaines. After all this, Scipio having his mind still occupied in matters of greater waight and importance, then those which he had already brought to paffe: he fell ficke. His fickenes being caried through all SPAYNE, and as it happeneth often, his disease being reported to be muche greater and daungerous then it was in deede: thereuppon, not only the nations of Spayne beganne to rife in hope of chaunge, but B the armie selfe also of the Romanus, the which he had left at Svero, First of all, martiall discipline was corrupted, through the absence of the Generall. Afterwardes also, the report of Therebollion his fickenes, and daunger of his life being spred abroad in the armie, raifed suche a rebellion of the Romans among them: that some of them litle regarding the authoritie and commandement of the gainst their head Captaines of the bands, they draue them away, and chose two meane souldiers for their Captaines, in Captaines, who presumptuouslie tooke vpon them the name genen vnto them by men of no Scipiots fick authority, and yet with more arrogancie, made the bundells of roddes and axes to be carried before them. Such follie doth furie and vaine ambicion oftentimes worke in mens minds. On the other fide, the SPANY ARDS flept not, and specially Mandonius and Indibilia: who aspiring Mandonius to the kingdom of Spayn s, came to Scipio when he was conqueror, after he had taken newe Indibitio, in C CART HAGE, But afterwards, being offended to fee the power of the Romanes increase daily; Sponto they fought occasion to make some alteracion. So after they had heard, not onely of Scipices ficknes, but also how he was at deathes dore, and did beleue it: they presentlie leavied an armie, and went and made warre with the Sybssitans which were confederates of the Ro-MANES. But Scipio being reconcred againe of his fickenes, like as vpon the faller umor of his death enery man beganne to rife : even so after the truth was known in deede of his recoverie; they were all put downe againe, and not a man of them durft proceede any further in their rebellion, Scipio being more skilfull in martiall discipline, then acquainted with fedition and Scipiou wife rebellion: although he was marueloully offended with the fouldiers that had committed this done finance. follie, yet in shelend, least following his anger, men should have thought him to have excect fing his anger, b ded all boundes of reason in punishing of them, he referred all vnto the counsell. The most parte of them gaue aduise, that the authors of the rebellion shoulde be punished, and all the rest pardoned for by this meanes fayd they, the punishment shall light vpon a few that have deserved it; and all the rest shall take example by them. Scipio followed that adule, and pre- Scipios great fently fent for all the feditions bandsyto come to new CART BAGE to receive their pay. For Seipia was wont to fay, that he had rather Seipiae care faue the life of one Romane citizen, then rokill a thow land enemies. The rumor ranne also, of his connic. that Scipio had an other armicreadic, the which he looked for to lovne with them, and then E to fee vpon the kings, (Mandonius & Indibilia) who made warre with the Swessitans, Thele fouldiers departing fro Swere; with good hope to obtaine pardon; came vinto Carrano b How beit the next day after they were congested the towns, they were brought into the many ker place: where their armorand/weapons being taken from them, they were entirouned with all the legions armie. Then the Romana Generall fitting in place of judgement showed him felfe beforeall the copany in as good health & good disposition of bodie as ever he was heall his youth. Then he murde he barpise barter or action, full of grienous complaints infomuch as there was not one of all the fouldiers that were vnarmed, that durft caff up their eyes, we Booke their Generall in the face they were for athamed For their confeiences did accuse them for the fault they had committed, and the feate of death did take their wits and fences from

Scipio did put brought forth before the whole affembly, who, after they had bene whipped according to the maner, were presently beheaded, the which was a fearefull and lamentable fight to the beholders. These matters thus pacified, Scipio made all the other fouldiers to be sworne againe, and then went and proclaimed warre against Mandonius and Indibilis. For they confidering with them selves, howe the ROMANE souldiers that had rebelled in the campe, were put to deaths they were out of hope to obtaine any pardon. Therefore they had leavied an army of twentie thowland footemen, & two thowland horsemen, and came downe with them against the Ro-MANES. Scipio having intelligence thereof, before that the kings could increase their army, & that other nations could rebel he departed from CARTHAGE, & went with as great speede as he could to meete with the enemy. The kings were camped in a very strong place, and trusted fo to their army, that they were not determined to prouoke the enemy, nor also to refuse the B battel if it were offred them. Howbeit it chaunced by the nerenes of both campes, that within few dayes, they being prouoked by the Romane s, came downe & fet their men in battell ray, & ioyned battell with Scipio: so that a good while together, the fight was very bloody & cruel. But at length the SPANYARD seeing them selues compassed in behinde, and being driven to fight in a ring to defend the enemy on every fide, they were overcome: fo that the third parte of them scarcely faued them selves by slying. Mandonius & Indibilis seeing them selves ytterly. vndone, & that there was no hope nor remedy left : they fent Ambaffadors vnto Scipio, humbly to pray him to receive them to mercy, and to pardon them. But Scipio knowing right well Anobic thing how greatly they had offended him, and the ROMANES, yet thinking it more honorable to ouercome the enemie by curtesie and elemency, then by force : he did pardon them, and only C the enemie by commanded them to gene him money to pay his fouldiers. In the meane time Malinissa came from GADES, & landed: bicause he would him selfe in person confirme the frendship he had cometh unto offered Scipio in his absence, by the meanes of M. Syllanus, and also speake with him face to face, whom he judged to be a worthie man, for the famous victories he had obteined. And in truth Masinissa was not deceived in the opinion he had of the valliantnes & vertues of Scipio, but found him the felfe fame man whom he beforehad imagined him to be in his minde; the which but feldom happeneth fo notwithstanding. For besides the great rare giftes of nature that Scipio had about all others, there was in him also a certaine Princely grace and maiestic. Furthermore, he was maruelous gentle & curteous vnto them that came to him, and had an eloquent tongue, and a passing gift to winne enerie man. He was verie graue in his gesture Dr. and behaulour, and euer ware long heare. Maliniffs being come to falute him, when he fawe him, he had him in suche admiration as it is reported, that he could not cast his eyes of him. nor have his fill of looking on him. So he thanked him manuelouslie for fending his Nephewevento him, and promifed him that his deedes thoulde confirme and witnesse the frendshippe agreed uppon between them: the which he cuerafter inuiolablic kept vato the Ro-MANES, even to the hower of his death. So all the nations of Seave became subject to the Empire of Rome, or at the least their confederates: whereupon those of Gades also follow-The entiqui- ing the example of others, came and yeelded themselves water the Roman Bar This is a verie auncient nation, and if we may credit the reporte of it: as Carrange was in Afrike, and Scipios noble THEBES in BOE OTIA, 10 was GADES vpon the fea, a Colony of the Tyrians. Scipio after he E had conquered all SPAYNE, and driven out the CARTHAGINIAMS, confidering that there remained nothing more for him to doe: he left the government of the province ynto L. Lentulus, and to Manlius Acidinus, and returned to Rome. When howas arrived at Rome, the Senate gave him audience out of the citie, in the temple of Bellows. There, when he had particularly told the of the things be had valliantly senfortunately brought to end: & further, that he had ouercome foure Capraines in divers foughte fields & alfoiput to flight foure armies of the onemics, & drive the CARTHAGINIANS out of both Spannes, & that there was no nation left in all those parts, but was subdued to the Romanus, the Senate gave judgement, that all thefe things were worthy of a poble triumphe. But bicause never man yet was suffred to enter into Rome in triúphe, for any victories he had obrained, whileft be was only but Viceconful, R and had not yet bene Conful the Senators thought it not good, and Scipio him felfe alfo made no great fure for it bicause he would not be an occasion to bring in any newe custome, SCIPIO AFRICAN. 1164 A and to breake the olde. So when he came into the citie, he was afterwardes declared Conful, Scipio made with the great good will and consent of the whole affemblie. It is reported that there never consul came such a world of people to Rome, as were there at that time, not only for the affemblies fake, but more to fee P. Cor. Scipio. Wherefore, not the Romanes onely, but all the ftraungers also that were there, all their eyes were vpon Scipio, and sayd both openly and prinately: that they should send him into A FRIKE, to make warre with the CARTHAG INIANS, at home in their owne contrie. Scipio also being of the same opinion, said, that he would aske aduise of the people, if the Senate would be against such a worthic enterprise. For amongest the peres and Senators, there were some that vehemently inueyed against that opinion, and among the rest, Fabius Maximus speciallie, a man of great fame and authoritie. Scipio went forward with B the matter, and thwarted him, and shewed many reasons that there was no way to ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS, and to drive Annibal out of ITALIE, but that only: and that all other counsells were in vaine, and vnproffitable. After this matter was long debated in counsell, S1-CILIA was appointed vnto Scipio: and the whole Senate gaue him commission to go with all his armie into AFRIKE, if he thought it meete and proffitable for the common wealth. The decree of the Senate being published, euerie mans minde ranne of so great enterprises, that they perswaded them selues A FRIKE was alreadic their owne, and had great hope to end this warre. Howbeit Scipio faw it a hard matter to make his preparation for this iorney, bicause of the pouertie of the common treasure, and for lacke of young men: the flower and choyce of the which was vtterlie gone, by the former great losses and ouerthrowes Annibal had genen C them. Howebeit to satisfie euerie mans expectacion of him, he made all the possible speede he could, to prepare thinges necessarie for the warres. So divers people of Thysean, and of the V MBRIANS, offered to helpe him to their best power: some of them gaue him timber to builde his shippes, others holpe him with armor, and others also furnished him with corne, and all other kinde of vittells and munition for his armie. The shippes being built, and all the armie by sea put in readines, in the space of fine and fortie dayes, a thing incredible to many: Scipio propa-Scipio departed out of ITALIB, and failed towards SICILB. But when he came to take muster redhis armie of his armie, he speciallie chose those that had serued long time in the warres, vnder the con- sea 14. duct of M. Marcellus, the which were all esteemed for veric expert souldiers. And for the S1- days. CILIANS, he partely wanne them by curtefie, and partely by compulsion compelled them to n geue him aide for the warre he tooke in hand, the which he ment to make in Afrika, when the time of the yeare should serue for it. Among other things, it is reported that Scipio chose out of divers cities, three hundred young gentlemen of the noblest houses of all the fayd prouince, and commaunded them to meete at a certaine day appointed, euerie man with horse schious poliand armor. Then comming at the day appointed, according to his commaundement: the cie in Sicilia, Conful bad them choose whether they would followe him in the warres of A FRIKE, or else deliuer vp their armor & horse, to as many other Romans as they were in number. So when they all prayed they might be dismissed from the warre, Scipio appointed three hundred other young ROMANES in their places, whom he had brought out of ITHEFE with him vnarmed, bicause he would mount and arme them at the Sicilians cost, as in deede it chaunced. Af-E terwards, they did him great service in A FRIKE, in many great battells. Now time was come on for Scipio to put his armie in garrison for the winter time, when he came to Syrac'vsattaking order not only for the preparation of warre, but also for the affaires of Stortes. There when it was tolde him by complaint of divers, that there was a great companie of ITALLAN fouldiers in that citie, who would not restore the spoiles which they had gotten in the warres, but kept them stil in their hands, notwithstanding that the Senate had enjoyeed them by speciall commaundement to make restitution to the Syrac vs ans: he straight compelled them by proclamation, to accomplishe the Senates commaundement. Whereby he wanne all the peoples hartes of Siciliamand was reported to be a just and vpright Conful. In the meane time he was aduertifed by Caius Lalius, that returned out of A FRIKE with great spoyle: howe would come into A FRIKE, as soone as he coulde possible, so it were without the prejudice of the common wealth. Moreover, that divers nations and people of A FRIKE had the like defire: who hating the gonernment of the CARTHAGINIANS, defired nothing more then some A good occasion to rebell. Nowe this iorney was not deferred through Scipices fault or negligence, confidering that fuch a Captaine could hardly be founde that was more carefull and diligent in his charge then he. Howbeit the affaires of Sicilia, and the oportunitie he had to recouer Lockes againe, did hinder him that he coulde not bring his purpose to passe according to his minde. Furthermore, his Lieutenaunt Pleminius disorder grieued him much: bicause that having left him at Lockes, he fell to all forces of insolencie, as to deflowre women, and to spoyle the poore citizens: insomuch that they being maruelously offended with these infinite troubles and villanies offered them, they determined rather to suffer all other things, then to be subject to the gouernment of so vile & wicked a man. So the Ambassadors of LOCRES being arrived at ROME, and exhibiting their complaintes in open Senate of the R great wrongs and injuries Pleminius did them: the noble men tooke the matter fo grieuoufly. that they made bitter decrees, not only against the same Pleminius, but also against P.C. Scipio himselfe. Wherupon Scipioes enemies having gotten matter enough to accuse him, they were then so bold to affirme, that he was acquainted with the injuries offred the Loc RIANS, with the licentiousnesse of Pleminius, and with the rebellions of his souldiers also: and that he had fuffred all these things more negligently, then became the office or duety of a Conful. They added thereto moreouer, that his army he had in Sicile was altogether vnruly & vnferuiceable, & regarded not the ordinances of the campe: and that the Captaine him felfe was careleffe, & altogether geuen ouer to pleasure and idlenes. But aboue all others, Fabius Maximus Q. Fabius was his heavy enemy, and so vehement against him in his words, that he exceded the bounds C a great adof all modesty and reason, and thought good to call him presently home out of Sicilia, and to difmiffe him of his charge. This decree was thought of all men very straight, & extreame. Wherefore following Quintus Metellus counsell, the Senators appointed ten Ambassadors to go into Sicilia, to make diligent inquiery, whether the accusations objected against Scipio were true: and if they found him in fault, that then they thould commaund him in the name of the Senate presently to returne into ITALY. And on the other side, if they fould that he was vniuftly accused, and only through the procurement of his malicious enemies & detracters: then that they should fend him to his armie, and encorage him valliantly to go forward with this warre. So when the Ambassadors were arrived in Sicilia, after they had made diligent inquiery according to the articles of their commission: they coulde not finde that Scipto was D faultie in any thing, fauing that he had too lightly passed ouer the wrongs and iniuries Pleminime had done vnto the LOCRIANS. For Scipio was verie liberall in rewarding of his men, and exceeding curteous and mercifull also in punishing of them. But when they saw his army, his shippes, and all his other furniture and munition for warre: it is reported that they wondred fo much to fee the great aboundance and good order taken for all thinges, that when they returned to Rome, they greatly commended Scipio, and rejecting all the accusations of his accufers, they did promise the Senate and people of Rome, affured hope of victory. So when all these home troubles at Rome were taken away, there chaunced other outward troubles a broad that grieued him much. For the Ambaffadors of king Syphax came and told him that King Sphar their maifter had made new league with the CARTHAGINIANS, & was become frend to Haf- E drubal, whose daughter he had maried: and therefore that he wished him if he ment to do his contry good, to make no attempt vpon AFRIKE, for he was determined to reckon the CAR-THAGINIANS frends his, & also to set vpon them whom the CARTHAGINIANS account their enemies. Scipio quickelie returned the Ambassadors againe vnto Syphax, bicause the effect of their comming should not be blowen abroad in his campe: & gaue them letters, in the which he praied king Syphax, that remembring his league and faithfull promife, he should beware he attempted nothing unworthy the name of a Romane, and faith of a king. Afterwards calling his men together, he told the, that the Ambassadors of king Syphax were come into Sicile.

A people, not only of those that were to faile into A FRIKE, but of others also that came to see the fleete & army of the Romanes: bicause they neuer saw an army better furnished, nor set out with all things necessary for warre, nor better replenished with fouldiers, then that. So Scipio, all things being ready, imbarked at LILY BEA with so carnest a desire to passe ouer the sea, that neither owers nor wind did content his minde. Yet he was brought in few daies failing, to the promontory or mountaine called fayer, and there he put all his men a land. The newes of his arriual flying straight to CARTHAGE, all the city was presently in such an uprore, that sodainly they founded the alarom, and garded the gates & walls, as appeareth by testimony of some in writing. For from M. Regulus time, vnto that present day, it was almost fifty yeares space since any ROMANE Captaine euer entred AFRIKE with force of armes. And therefore it was no B maruell though they were affrayed, and grew to vprore. The name of Scipio did encrease their fearethemore, bicaufe the CARTHAGINIANS had no Captaine matchable with him, Hafdrubal the sonne of Gifgo had the name at that time of a lusty Captaine, whom they knew had notwithstanding bene ouercome, and driven out of Spatne by Scipio. Howbeit putting all the hope & fafety of their contry in him, & in king Syphax that mighty king: they neuer left intreating the one, nor perswading the other, to come & helpe the affaires of A FRIME, with all the spede they could possible. So, whilest they two were preparing to joyne both their armies together, Annibal the sonne of Hamilear, being appointed to kepe the next contry adjoyning to it, came against the Romanes. Scipio after he had destroyed the contry, & enriched his army with great spoyle:he camped by the city of V TICA, to fee if it were possible for him to win C fo noble and wealthy a city, and being besides so commodious for the warres both by sea and land. At the selfe same time Masinissa came to the Romanus campe, and was inflamed with a Theready & vehement desire to make warre against king Syphax, by whom he had before bene driven out faithfull good of his kingdom & inheritance. Scipio, that had knowen him in SPAYNE, a young Prince of an will of Magexcellent wit, and quicke & valliant of his hand: he fent him to discouer the army of the enemies, before the Carthag inians could gather any greater power, and willed him to vie all the deuise and meanes he coulde possible to intile Hanno to fight. Masinisa as he was commaunded, began to prouoke the enemy, and drawing him out by litle & litle, he brought him where Scipio lay with all his legions armed, looking for a good hower to fight. The armie of the enemies was nowe wearied, when the ROMANES came to fet vpon them with their freshe D army, Hanno at the first onset was our comen, & slaine, with most of his men: and all the rest Hannounce fled, and dispersed them selves here and there, where they thought they might best scape, After this victory, Scipio returning backe againe to befrege the city of VTICA: the fodaine com- faine. ming of Hafdrubal and king Syphax, made him to leave of his enterprise, for that they brought with them a great army both of footemen & horsemen, and came and camped not farre from the ROMANES. Scipio perceiuing that, raised his siege immediatly, and came and fortified his campe vpon a hill, from whence he might go & fight with the enemy, and moleft them of V-TIC A, and also keepe his shippes safe that road at ancker. How beit the time of the yeare being comen, that both armies were to dispose their men in garrisons for the winter season: he determined to fend vnto king Syphax to feele his minde, and to make him leave the frendshippe E of the Carthaginians if it were possible. For he knew well it was his mariage with Sophanisba, that through her flattering perswasions had brought him to that furie, that he had not king Spring only for faken the frendshippe of the Romans, but also ment to destroy them, contrary to his wife. faith and promise: and that if he had once satisfied the heate of his loue with her, he thought then he might be called home againe, Syphax having vnderstoode Scipioes message fent him, he answered, that in dede it was time not only to leauetheleague with the CARTHAO INTANS, but also to geue vp all thought of warre: and so promised, that he would be a good meane to make peace. These fellowes, whilest the Ambassadors and king Syphax were in talke together about the articles and condicions of peace, and that the confultation helde lenger then it was wont to doe: they went and walked vp and downe through the enemies campe, to see all the wayes and entries into

Truce was taken for a time, the which being expired, Scipio feemed to make preparation for warres, (as being out of hope of any peace) & to make his army ready by feapreparing engines of batterie to returne to beliege VTICA, as he had done before. He gaue out this rumor through all the contry, to perfwade his enemies that it was true: howbeit hauing called the Captaines & pety Captaines of his army together, he made them print to his intent & enterprise. He told them that both the enemies campes lay not farre a funder, of the which, the one of them had all their tents & cabbons of wodde: and the building of the other campe was all of reedes, so that they were both easie to be burnt. Wherupon having sent for Maliniffa, and Cains Lelius to come vnto him, he gave them charge about midnight to geve alarom vnto Syphax campe, and to fet it a fire: and that he him felfe on the other fide, would fet B yponthe CARTHAGINIANS campe. They two obeying Scipices commaundement, performed his will without delay, & came at the hower appointed the to affaile the NVMIDIANS campe, and so did set the houses of reedes afire, which tooke fire in such fort, as the slame was immediatly rounde about the campe. The NVMIDIANS at the first, thinking the fire had comen by missfortune, ranne thither straight vnarmed to quench it. But when they found them sclues among the legions of the ROMANES, and that there was nothing but killing downeright, feeing them selues so compassed in on all sides, they saw their best remedie was to flie. On the other fide also, where Scipioes army was: the CARTHAG INI AANS campe was almost all burnt, A manuelum an the enemies put to flight with fuch cruell flaughter, that some wryters affirme there were gree flags. flaine that night about fortie thow fand men, as well Carthaginians as Nymidians. This C great ouerthrow and slaughter being caried to CARTHAGE, did put the citizens there in such a feare and terror, that some thought best to send for Annibal out of ITALIE: and others gaue aduise to make peace with Scipio. Howbeit the BARCINIAN faction which was rich and wealthy, & altogether against the peace makers: they so preuailed, that they leavied a new power to begin warre againe. King Syphax and Hafdrubal, having leavied a great multitude of footemen and horsemen againe, renewed their armie sooner then was looked for, and came againe to pitche their campe directly ouer against the enemies. Scipio hauing vnderstanding of that, would not tary, but determined to geue them battell, whileft his men were in good hart, and willing to fight. So it chaunced at the first, by the necrenes of both their campes, that there were certaine skirmishes: but in the end, the armies came to joyne battell, and the Romanes D fought with fuch corage & terror, that at the first onset, they made the NVMIDIANS & CAR-THAG IN IANS flie, and flue the most part of them. Has drubal and Syphax scaped, by flying out of the flaughter. Scipio sent Masinissa, & Caius Lalius with the light horsemen to give them chase. Syphax being comen into N v MIDIA, & from thence into his owne realme & kingdom he leauied an army in hast, of all forts of people, & came to meete with Masinissa & Caius Lalius, and was not affrayed to geue them battell. But it was a fond parte of him, confidering that he was nothing like fo ftrong as his enemy, neither for nuber of fighting men, nor yet in likely hood of fouldiers. For neither the fouldiers, nor Captaines of his army were matchable with the foul-Syphar, king diers & Captaines of the Romanes cape: & therfore king Syphan was eafily ouercome by such of the Majar skilful fouldiers, & moreouer was him selfetaken in battel, with many other great noble men, B. whom Masinissa woldhardly hauelooked for: & the they were brought vnto Scipio. At the first there was a maruelous ioy amog the, when it was told the that king Syphax should be brought prisoner vnto the cape:but afterwards when they saw him bound, they were al fory to see him in such pitysull state, remebring his former greatnes & regall maiesty. For they called to mind how famous the name of this king had bene but a litle before, what wonderful great wealth he had, & also the power of so great a realme & kingdom. Howbeit Scipto the ROMANE Conful, received him very curteoutly, & gently asked him what he ment to chaunge his mind in that fort, & what moued him to make warre with the ROMANES. Then the king remebring his former frendship & faithful promise broken, he boldly told him, that it was the loue he bare to his wife Sophonisha, who only had procured him to deale fo dishonorably with the Romanes: how-F beit, that he had fo smarted for it, as all others might take example by him, and beware how they breake their promise. And yet, that this was a great comfort to him in his extreame miA fery, to see that his mortall enemy Massaiffa was also taken with that franzie and mind bumor, 1107 wherewith he before was poffeffed. For after Syphan was ouercome and taken; Maffinffa went vnto CYRTHA, the chiefe city of the realme, the which he wan, and found sopposition there; Majorifa with whom he fell in fancy: who after the had finely wrapped him in with her decential dates were the eleteries and kindnes, he promifed her also to deliuer her out of the Romanns hardely & bicause where he had been also to deliuer her out of the Romanns had been shown in full he might the better performe his promise made, he tooke her to his wife, & maried her. Whe in the was Scipio was informed of these things, it grieued him maruelously. For it was knowers to all men; that Syphax was ouercome under the conduct, & through the Roman as meanes and there with fore all that was belonging to Syphax, was at the disposition of the ROMANES. Wherefore if Masinissa had without Scipioes consent, vndertaken to defend Sophonisbaes quarrell: then traps

B peared plainly, he despised the authority of the Consul, & the maiesty of the people of Roxes Furthermore, his filthie lust did agrauate his fault the more, the which seemed so me h more intollerable, by how much the continency of the ROMANB Conful was the greater, the which The great of Massins and ally before his eyes, and might have bene a paterne and example vote him. For Scipio, besides many other proofes and shewes of his vertues, in all places where heobtayned victory, he alwayes kept the women vndefiled, which were taken prisoners. So, sepio being much offended with Masinista, (though he shewed it not before company) received him very louingly at his returne to the campe : yet afterwards notwithstanding, taking him aside, he fo tharply reproued him, that he made him know what it was to obey a moderate, and also a fee uere Captaine. Whereupon Masinissa went into his tent and wept, & could not tell what way

C he should take : howbeit shortly after, perceiving that it was vnpossible for him to keepe promile with Sophonisha, which grieued him to the hart; he fent her poyfon, & a meffage withall, Sophonisha mife with Sophonisha, which grieued him to the hart; he tent her poyton, & a metage withall, Sophonush the which the dranke immediatly, & fo willingly made her felfe away. Furthermore, the C. R. Who returning with great speede into Arkins, before hedid any thing elfe, he thought good first for monthly

In the end, Scipia offred Annibal fuch condictions of peace, that by them it appeared the Romanes were notwearie of warre, and that Scipio him felfe being a young man, had better hope to obtaine victorie, then great delire to hearken to peace. So, all hope of peace being fet aside, they brake of their talke, and the next morning two famous and worthic Captaines of the most noble nations that could be, prepared them selues to battell, either to geue or take away in short time from their comor weales, the seigniorie and Empire of all the worlde. The place where they imployed all their sorce, and where this famous battell was fought, as it is reported, was by the citie of Zante: in the Bandle Zd.

Annibal fled out of the fury of the battell, & faued him felfe, though that day he had shewed him selfe like a valliant and samous Captaine. For at this battell he had sethis armie in better order then euer he had done before, and had strengthened it, both with she commoditie of the place, and reliefe besides? and even in the verie surie and terror of the battell he so besturred him selfe among his souldiers, that the enemies them selves did command & praife him, for a noble Captaine. After this victory, Scipio meeting with Fermina king Syphan fonne, that brought aide to the CARTHAGINIANS: he put him to flight, and came and brought F his army to the walls and haven of CARTHAGB, thinking (as in deede it fel out) that the GAR specially when they saw their Generall Annibal ouercomen, in whom they chiefly reposed all A their hope and trust, for defense of their contrie. Wherefore they being (as I have fayed) out of hart, fent Ambaffadors vnto Scipio, to pray him that according to his accustomed clemencie he woulde graunt them peace. Nowe was great fute made at Rome, to have the go-Bernment of the province of AFRIKE, and one of the newe Confuls made hast to come and make warre with fuch charge and preparation as was meete for his dignitie and calling: and therefore Scipio doubting that an other shoulde carie away the glorie for ending of so great a warre, he was the better contented to yeeld to the CARTHAG INIAN Ambaffadors requestes. So, the capitulació of the articles of peace was offred vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, according to the conquerors mind: and besides all other things, the whole sleete of all their shippes and gallies (in the which confifted much their hope) were taken from them. For when the whole R fleete was burnt, it was such a lamentable sight vnto them all, that there was no other thing but weeping and lamenting through the whole city, as if CARTHAGE had bene destroied and Fine hundred rafed to the very ground. For as some doe write, there were fine hundred shippes burnt of all Bipper of the fortes. These things therefore should make vs all beware of humaine frayeltie, the which we Canbaginia, often forget in our prosperitie. For they that before perswaded them selves to conquer the world, after they had wonne so many great battells and victories of the enemie, and in maner conquered all ITALIE, and so valliantly besides besieged the city of Rome: were in short time after brought to fuch mifery and extreamity, that all their power and force being ouercome, they had left them no more but the walls of CARTHAGE, and yet they were not fure to keepe them, but through the speciall grace and fauor of the enemie. After these things were done, C Scipio by decree of the Senate, did not only restore king Masinisa to his realme againe, but also adding thereunto the best part of all king Syphax contrie, they made him one of the mightiest kings of all A FRIXE; and afterwards he gaue honorable gifts vnto euery man as he had deferued. In fine, after he had fet all the affaires of A FRIKE at good ftay, he brought his army backe againe into ITALIE: at what time there came to Rome a world of people, to see so great and famous a Captaine, returning from fuch wonderfull great victories. So he entred into Roma with pompe of triumphe, Terentina Cules following of him with a hatte on his head, bicaule that through his fauor and frendship he was taken out of bondage. Polybius wryteth, that king Syphax was led in triumphe: how beit fome say he dyed before Scipio triumphed. In deede diuers that did triumphe, some before him during the warres of the CARTHAGINIANS, and o- 13 thers afterwards in the warres of MACEDONIA & As ta, they made greater shew of plate, both of gold and filuer in their triumphe, and led also a greater number of prisoners; howbeit one onely Annibal that was our come, and the glorie of fo great a warre ended, did make the triumphe of P. Scipio to excellent and famous, that it facre passed all the golde and magnificent pompe of all others triumphes. For after A FRIKE was conquered, no nation then was afhamed to be ouercome by the ROMANES. For he made this prouince, as it were a bridge and open passage to increase and enlarge the Empire of Rome, both in Machon, and also in A. SIA, and in other parts of the world befides. Now Scipio (whom I may rightly call African, after the conquest of AFREED being returned to Rome, he lacked no temporall dignities nor honors. For in the counfell holden for the election of Cenfors, although there were divers o- R there of the noblest houses of Rous that fued for that office : yet he him selfe, and AElius Pethe were preferred before all the rest, and after they were created Censors, they did gouerne in their office like good men, and with good quietnes. They two were the first (as it is reported that deuided the noble men and Senators from the people, in the showe place to see pastime. Lucius Scipio the Consul brought great honor to his contrie by that warre, for that he followed the founde and faithfull counsell of his brother. For first of all goinge into GRECE, he tooke truce sonfixe monethes with the A-TO LIAMS, through the aduise of his brother A FRICANS who counselled him, that setting all thinges a parte, he shoulde straight goe into Asia, where the warre was ryfest. So the authoritie of the African was verie great, and all those that woulde obtaine any thing of the Conful, cathe first to the AFRICAN to be their meane and intercessor. Nowe when he came into Asia, Antiochus Ambassador, and Heraclides Bi-ZANT IN B, CAME VIITO him to offer to make peace, and after they had openly tolde their meflage, perceiping that they could not obtaine reasonable condicions of peaces, they primately talked with Scipia A PRICAN as they were commaunded, and practifed the belt they coulds to make him king Antiochus frende. But P. Scipio, to shewe some token of a thankefull minde, prayed the Ambassadors that came vnto him, B greatlie to thanke king Antrochus for the exceeding pleasure he had done him, to sende him his sonne. Afterwardes he gaue Antiochus aduise also that he should not geue battell, till he vnderstoode of his returne from E LEA to the campe. So Antiochus being perswaded by the authoritie of so worthie a man, he kept close in his campe for a certaine time, and determined to drawe the warre out at length, hoping in the ende that he might come to speake with the Conful, by the AFRICANS meanes. But afterwardes, the Conful camping hard by Ma-GNESEA, did for vexe and prouoke the enemie, that the king came out to battell, and fette his men in battell ray. It is reported that Annibal him felfe was present at the battell, being one of the Generalls for the king. So Antiochus being ouercome, and his armie discomfitted, perceiuing that there was no helpe in his affaires : he came vnto the African, (who being C newlie recourred of his fickenes, came to the campe within a litle after the field was wonne and by his meanes obtayned of the Conful to be contented to talke of peace. When Antiochus Ambassadors were come to the campe, and that they had humblie craued pardon in the behalfe of their king, and also prayed that they would geue them suche condicions of peace, as they best liked of Serpio AFRICAN with the consent of them all aunswered them, that it was not the manner of the Romanes to yeeld to adversitie, neither also to be prowde in prosperitie and therefore that he nowe made him the selfe same offers and condicions of peace, which he did before the victorie. That the king shoulde not meddle with EVROPE, that he should surrender up all he had in Asia from the mountaine Taurus, vnto the river of Tanais: that he shoulde pay tribute twentie yeres together: that he shoulde also put in suche oftages D as the Conful would choose out and that specially aboue all the rest, they should deliuer Annibal CARTHAGINIAN unto the Conful, who was the only author and procurer of this warre. But he, as we have wrytten in his life, perceiuing that king Antiochus armie was ouerthrowen both by fea and by lande, escaped the Romanes handes, and went vnto Prusias king of BITHYNIA. Antiochus hauing accepted the offers and condicions of peace, fayd, that the Ro-MANES vied him verie fauourablie, to ridde him of so great care, and to appoint him so fmall a kingdome. For great kingdomes, and ouermuch wealth which euerie man coueteth, are full of great and fundrie troubles infomuch that Theorrisus wordes are as true, as otherwealth are ful wise excellently written.

The refreshed B of these thinges did not mislike the common people that were present: bicause he did a rather to auoyd the daunger prepared for him, then otherwife for any vaine glory or oftentation. Howbeit the Tribunes not being so contented, were vehement against him, and spared no iniurious words, but accused him as though he had in deede bene in fault, howbeit vponsuspition, rather then of any due proofe. The next morning being commaunded to come before them againe, he appeared at the hower appoynted, and being well accompanied with his friends, he came through the whole affembly, and went up to the pulpit for orations, Wisen he faw that euery man kept filence, then he spake in this manner. So he departed thence, and all the whole affembly followed him not onely to the Capitoll, bur also to all the other temples of the citie, leaving the two Tribunes all alone with their Sergeaunts. That days was the very last days of all the A PRI CANS good The Lastin fortune, for the great affembly and multitude of people that wayted upon him; and for the the Africant great good will they bare him . as he was of a noble minde, he thought it more honor willingly to give place to his entities, then to seeke to mainteyne his greatnes by force of armes. So when the Tribunes did accluse D him of contempt, and that his brother Lucius did excuse his absence by reason of his stekenes: Tiberius Gracchus, one of the Tribunes that was against the A FRIC ANS tooke his excuse (be-T. For they were marueloufly offended for the great injurie they did him. Some doewrite, that P. told him againe, that he should not have married her without consent of her mother, though Ahe could have bestowed her vpon Tiberius Graechus. This auswer liked Scipio maruclous wel. when he faw that his wife was of his mind, touching the mariage of their Daughter. I knowe it is thought of some, that it was attributed to Tiberius the sonne, and to Appius Claudius his father in lawe. For Polybius, and other auncient writers affirme, that Cornelia, the mother of Caises and Tiberius Gracchi, was maried vnto Gracchus after the Africans death . For Scipio

A FRICAN was maried unto AEmylia the Daughter of L. Paulus AEmylius Conful, that was flavne at the battell of CANNES. By her he had two Daughters, of the which the eldest was maried vnto P. Cornelius Nasica, and the younger vnto Tiberius Gracchus, either before, or aften the death of his father. Nowe towching his fonne, there is litle mention made of him in writing, that a man may write of certainty to be true. We have spoken of his younger sonne that R was taken by king Antiochus, and afterwards franckly fent vnto his father: of whome notwithstanding afterwards I find no mention in writing fauing that some say he was afterwards Prætor, and that he came to this office by meanes of Cicereius his fathers Secretary. There appeareth in writing also, that the younger African was adopted by the sonne of P. Scipio. Cicero in his booke intituled Cato Major fayth, how weake (fayd he) was the fonne of P. A FRICAN that adopted thee his sonne? And in his sixth booke also de repub. A Emplius the father exhorteth Scipio his sonne, to follow instice and piety, as his grandfather Scipio A FRICAN had done.

And touching the death of P. Scipio AFRICAN, writers doe diverfly varye: for some fay that he dyed, and was buryed at Rome. And for proofe thereof they doe bringe forth the monument that was fer vp for him by the gate Capena, ouer the which stoode three statues or i- C mages, two whereof were the images of P. and Lucius Scipio, and the third was of Q. Ennius the Poet. And furely that which Cicero wrote, feemeth to confirme it true: our Enniue, fayd he, was maruelously beloued of A FRICAN the great, and therefore it is thought that he was buryed in Scipioes tombe. Other authors write also (and surely they agree best with the common report) that Scipio A FRICAN dyed at LINTERNYM, and that there he was buried at his owne appoyntment: bicause his contry so withankfully acknowledging his service, should do him no honor at his death; and that there they fet him up a tombe, and his statue upon that, the which afterwards was blowen downe by a tempest of wind, and the which Linie him selfe wit-

Annibal with P. Scipio African.

90 W let vs compare Annibal and Scipioes deedes together as tout ching their civill discipline . First, if we remember their deedes in warres, it is manifest that both of them have bene great and famous Captaines in warre, and that they have not onello bene comparable with the noblest Kinges and Princes in their time (being also in that age when warres florished most) but with those also that were before their time. One thing maketh me wonder much arther sharthey hauing great and heavy enemies in their contry, (who fought to ouerthrow all their doings and enterprises) could possibly goe thorough with fo great matters, and to obtayne fuch happie and famous victories in firaunge and for-B revne warres. Therefore paffing ouer all other matters, what a doe had P. Seipie, before he could obtayne to be fent into Africa, to make warre with the Charmagin rans? Fabius Maximus, and other noble men of the citie being greatly against it? Againe, what themy had Annibal of Hanno, who was Prince and head of the contrary faction against him? Now, they both having ouercomen fuch great troubles at home, did not with standing bringe thinges to end worthy perpetual metriorie: not by chaunce, as it hapneth vnto many, but through their industrie, great wisedom, and counsell. So, divers doe wonder greatly at Annibalocorage and noble mind: who after he had facked the citie of SAGVNTVS, came boldly from the furdeft part of the worldinto LTALY, and brought with him a great army of footenien and horsemen, and came tomake warre with a great state and common wealth, the which his predecessors C alwayes dreaded: and after he had wonne many battells, and flayne fundry Confuls and Captaines of the ROMANES, he came and cambed hard by the citie of Rome infelfe, and procured Rraunge kings and farronations to make warre with the Romanus . He that was able to doe fo great things as thefe, medican not otherwise thinke of him, but that he was a great and valiant Captairle Others allouspeaking of Scipio, doe greatly prayle and commend him for the foure Chiefraines he outercame, and for the foure great armies which he defeated, and purto dight in Spa was, and allo for that he our reame and tooke that great king sophan prifoner. In fine, they come to prayfe that famous battellin the which Seipio out carre Annibal at Than 6. For if Fabius (fayd they) were prayled phicanie he was not outercome by Annibal: what effimation will they make of the A FX 1 CAN; that in a pinched battell outercame that for famous & D dreadfull Captaine Annibul, and also didentite so daungerous a warre? Befides alforthae Scipio did alwayes make open warre, and commonly fought with the enemy implaine field. Where Annibal in contrary manner did alwayes we craft and findely, and was full of first ageames & policie. And therefore all Authors both Grake and Dayny doe count him very fine and luttell. Furthermore, they greatly commend annibation that he mayneyated his army of to him-dry nations, so long time in peace, as the had warre with the Romanus: and yet that there A was neuer any mutinie of rebellion in his campe. On the other fide they blame him againe, bicause he did not follow his victory, when he had ouercomen the Romanes at that famous battell of CANNES: and also bicaute he spoyled his souldiers with too much ease, and the pleasures of CAMPANTA and APVLIA, whereby they were so chaunged, that they seemed to be other souldiers then those that had ouercomen the ROMANES, at the sundry battells of TREETA. THRASY MENE, and CANNES. All writers doe reproue these thinges in Annibal, but fpecially his crueltie. For amongest other thinges, what crueltie was it of him to make a woman with her children to come from ARPI to his campe, and afterwardes to burne them alive? What shall a man say of them whome he cruelly put to death, in the temple of Iuno Lacinia, when he departed out of ITALY? For Scipio AFRICAN on the other fide, if we shall ra- B ther credit the belt authors that write, then a number of other detracters and malitious writers: we may fay he was a bountifull and temperate Captaine, and not onely lively and valiant in fight, but also curreous and mercifull after victorye. For oftentimes his enemies proued his valiantnes, the vanquithed his mercy and clemency, & all other men his faithfulnes. Now therfore, let vs tel you what his continency & liberalitie was, the which he shewed in SPAYNE Vnto a young Lady taken prisoner, and vnto Luceius Prince of the CELTIBERIANS: dothit not deserve great prayse? Nowe for their private doings, they were both vertuously brought vp, and both of them imbraced learned men. For as it is reported, Annibal was very famillier with Socillus LACED EMONIAN, as the AFRICAN was with Enniue the Poet. Some faye alfo, that Annibal was so wellearned in the Græke tongue, that he wrote an historie in Græke tou- G ching the deedes of Manlius Volfo. Now truely I doe agree with Cicero, that fayd in his booke de Oratore, that Annibal heard Phormio PERIPATETICIAN in EPHES vs, discoursing very largely of the office and duety of a Chieftaine and generall, and of the martiall lawes & ordinaunces: and that immediatly after being asked what he thought of that Philosopher, he should aunswer in no very perfit Græke, but yet in Græke, that he had seene many old doting fooles, but that he had never feene a greater doterd then Phormio . Furthermore, both of them had an excellent grace in their talke, & Annibal had asharpe tawnting wit in his aunswers. When king Antiochus on a time prepared to make warre with the Rouanns, and had put his army into the field, not forwell furnished with armor and weapon, as with gold and filuer: he asked Annibal, if he thought his army fufficient for the ROMANES? yea (Sir) o he, that they be, were D the enemies neuer fo couetous. This may truely be fayd of Annibal, that he obtayned many great victories in the warres, but yet they turned to the destruction of his contry. Scipio in contrary manner did preserve his contry in such safetie, and also did so much increase the dominions thereof: that as many as shall looke into his defert, they can not but call Rome vnthankefull, which liked rather that the African (preferrer of the citie) should goe out of Rome, then that they would repreffe the fury and infolency of a few. And for myne owne opinion; I can not thinke well of that citie, that so yuthankfully hath suffred so worthy and innocent a person to be injured: and so would I also have thought it more blame worthy, if the cirie had bene an ayder of the injurye offred him . In fine, the Senate (as all men doe report) gaue great thankes vinto Tiberius Gracchus, bicause he did defend the Scipions cause: and the E Common people also following the AFRICAN, when he visited all the temples of ROMB, and left the Tribunes alone that accused him, did thereby shewe how much they did loue and honor the name of the Scipioes. And therefore, if we should judge the Citizens harts and good wills by those things, men would rather condemne shem for cowards, to have suffered such outrage, then vnthankfull for forgetting of his benefits: for there were very few that confentell to fo wicked a deede, and all of them in manner were very fory for it. Howbeit Scipio, that was a man of a great minde, not minch regarding the malice of his enemies: was content rather to leave the citie, then by civill warres to destroy at . For he would not come against his contry with enfigings displaied, neither would be folicite straungenations and mighty kings to come with force and their ayde to deflire the citie, the which he had beautified with fo many spoyles and triumphes: as Martine Coriolania, Blaibiades, and divers others did, by record of anneient flories. For we may eatily perceive howe carefull he was to preferue the libertie

A of Rome bicause when he was in Spayne, he refused the title and name of king which was offred him and for that he was maruelous angry with the people of Rome, bicause they would have made him perpetual! Conful and Dictator: and confidering also that he commaunded they should set up no statue of him, nether in the place of the assembly, nor in the iudgement seate, nor in the Capitoll. All which honors afterwardes were gluen by the Citizens vnto Cafar, that had ouercomen Pompey. These were the civill vertues of the African, which were great and true prayfes of continency. Now therefore, to deliuer you the fumme and effect of all these thinges: these two so famous Captaines are not so much to be compared together in their civill vertues (in the which Scipio chiefly excelled) as in the discipline of warres, and in the glory of their famous victories. To con-B clude, their deathes were lomewhat a like: for they both dyed out of their contries, although Scipio was not condemned by his contry as Annibal was, but would by voluntary banishment dye out of the citie.
